HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Find Petrified Daddy of All Lobsters

ARE YOU FOND OF LOBSTER MISS HIGHKICK ?

CAMBRIDGE, Mass.—The progenitor of all the lobsters and the original oyster that existed eons before the first man who was brave enough to swallow one, have been added to the geological collection of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and they are only two of 2,000 specimens of petrified remains of prehistoric creatures gathered by Prof. Hervey Shimer and Mrs. Shimer during a six months' tour of Bohemia, France, England, Ireland, Wales and other countries.

The lobster, a fine specimen, existed about 50,000,000 years ago, the geologists calculate. It was found in the mountains near Bohemia and many miles from the sea.

This is not to say that lobsters grew on trees in those remote days; the water, receding in the course of ages, left the lobster stranded and he got petrified. Similar but much more modern phenomena are not unknown here. Harvard and "Tech" students are sometimes left stranded after buying many lobsters of a night, but they do not get petrified, of course.

Millions of years after this particular lobster passed away the sporty young men of the stone age cracked its descendants with their flint hatchets and treated the stony show girls of that period. Indeed, some geologists claim that the term "lobster" as applied to sporty young men who do that sort of thing has descended from the stone age; they have been doing so ever since.

The petrified oyster is much more ancient than any ever found in a church stew. It also lived and breathed and had its troubles and joys 50,000,000 years ago. Prof. Shimer found it atop the Jura mountains in north Switzerland. How it got there only geologists can tell you.

Farm Waif Wins Fortune in the City

KANSAS CITY, Kan.—There is in this city a woman, still young, whose ambition was born when she was an unsophisticated country girl of 13, who did not know what failure meant, and who came to the city and made a fortune in open competition with shrewd financiers and daring speculators.

Annie J. Scott, a penniless orphan, was sent to a farm in Lafayette county, Mo., when she was 8 years old, as nursemaid and "help." The success of a neighbor's child incited her to study and save money, so that she might attend the Warrensburg Normal school. She milked cows, sold butter and saved $50. Then she went to Warrensburg and worked her way in three years through the normal school, graduating in 1894.

Her first ambition was to become a missionary, but she became ill and was cared for at the German Hospital in Kansas City. There she determined to be a doctor, and in 1897 entered the medical college of the University of Kansas, where on graduation she finished third in a class made up almost wholly of men students. It was the winter of the first smallpox epidemic in Kansas City. She was employed by the city and cared for 2,000 smallpox patients. When she left her position with the city in 1902 she had $2,000.

With two partners she invested it in an 11-acre tract near Forty-third street and the State line. This tract was platted in city lots and marketed, and in a year she had her $2,000 back and $5,000 more. Then she put the $7,000 in an adjoining tract of 22 acres, with the same partners, and they cleared $55,000.

In the succeeding five years she built and sold 200 houses and cleared more than $100,000. She draws her own plans, buys her own material and personally "bosses" each job she undertakes, overseeing every detail of the work.

Razers Eye a Historic Old Mansion

IT WOULD BE A SHAME TO TEAR IT DOWN

PHILADELPHIA.—Through the recent death of Miss Jane R. Haines, after a lifetime spent within its rambling, tradition-haunted halls, Wyck, the ancestral Haines mansion, at Germantown avenue and Walnut lane, is threatened with possible destruction, should the historic ground on which it stands be sold.

Under its weather-beaten eaves repose perhaps, more sturdy mementos of Philadelphia's history than in any other private manse of the many for which the city is famous. Flooring upon which the blood of British and American soldiers mingled during the battle of Germantown, is stored for keepsake in its cobwebbed old attic. The chair in which Lafayette sat when he visited Germantown in 1824, and when he was given a reception at Wyck, is still to be found in the midst of the silent quaintness of the now untenanted old homestead.

The nucleus for the old structure was first built in 1698, by one Dirck Jansen, whose daughter married one Caspar Wistar; through the marriage of Wistar's daughter to Reuben Haines in 1760, and by subsequent inheritance through direct kinship, Miss Haines came into possession of the long, white, hospitable-seeming old structure, which took its name from an old English residence belonging to the family.

The Germantown road, when the original house was built, was nothing but a winding woodland path, and an Indian trail diverging from it passed where now stands the conservatory on the Walnut lane side of the house.

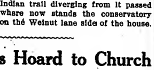
Aged Newsie Leaves Hoard to Church

ST. LOUIS.—Lawrence Ring, for years a familiar character in the vicinity of Third and Chestnut streets, where he sold papers, died at the City Hospital of apoplexy. Recently his will was filed for probate, and after that tales of fortunes deposited in various banks were heard.

"Larry" lived the life of a recluse. His home was a single room in the antiquated structure at 6 North Third street. There he came of an evening, cooked his modest supper, smoked his pipe and pored for hours over the news of the world. He was believed to be about 75 years old.

He was a veteran of the civil war and a pensioner. He was on the vessel which was blown up at Fort Fisher. Of this it was his greatest pride to tell. Often he declared that Admiral George Dewey, the hero of Manila, had been his captain. But he never told anyone he had a bank account.

In his will he leaves to the pastor of the old cathedral on Walnut street



$50 for masses for the repose of his soul and the rest to the church fund. He named the Mississippi Valley Trust Company executor. Just what the "rest" will amount to no one knows. However, his deposit at the trust company was but $100. He also had a safety deposit box in his name at that institution, which has not been opened as the key could not be found.

His room was modestly furnished and orderly, but there was nothing of value to be seen. Ring had been sick a week and was taken to the City Hospital a few nights ago, friends having telephoned the dispensary that he was unconscious.

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

PROSECUTED THE M'NAMARAS

In the quest of the "men higher up," said to be involved in the Los Angeles dynamiting plot that resulted in the confession of the McNamara brothers, John D. Fredericks, district attorney, is pretty certain to be a looming figure.

All through the trial of the brothers Mr. Fredericks showed an unmistakable brand of judgment and energy. He and his associates were opposed by the cleverest counsel that could be obtained, but the trial was a regular progress of victories for the prosecution, even before the later stages when outside events began to undermine the case of the defense. Added to Mr. Fredericks' legal acumen is a large fund of personal popularity in California.

In addition to being a stern and rather uncompromising individual Mr. Fredericks is a man of imagination and distinctive sentiment. A little more than a year ago, when he attended a meeting of the Los Angeles "Votes for Women" club, Mr. Fredericks was invited to attend and speak on "Woman's Sphere on Politics," which he did, but first he got into the program in a very unexpected manner when the members were asked to sing a sort of parody on "America."

TELLS OF CHINESE HORRORS

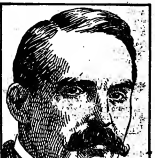
Gradually the horror of the present outbreak in unhappy China is being brought home to us as the news sifts through the press censor's fingers by way of private letters from officials and missionaries who are in the midst of the turmoil and bloodshed. To the friends here who receive such letters details of the tragedy of war are brought home with stunning force.

Dr. Joseph Beech, whose portrait is here shown, is one of those who, through no act of their own, are on the firing line, so to say, in the rebellious provinces of China.

In a letter to a friend here in America Dr. Beech describes his experiences after the outbreak against the Manchu dynasty and declares that the suffering there is beyond description. He states that over 6,000 persons were ruthlessly slaughtered, while many women and girls committed suicide at Chentu, West China, where he is connected with the Chentu Methodist Episcopal College.

He was still penned up there with the refugees in Chentu when the letter was written, but this letter was smuggled through the disturbed area in some manner and found its way to the friend here, who has made known its contents.

WINNER OF A NOBLE PRIZE



Prof. Wilhelm Wein, whose picture appears herewith, was recently awarded the Noble prize for Physics. Professor Wein is only 47 years old. He studied at the University of Gottingen, Heidelburg and Berlin, and is the author of a number of books on Roentgen rays, hydrodynamics and electricity.

The awarding of the Nobel prizes is an annual occasion of great interest throughout the world. It takes place on the anniversary of the death of the founder of the fund, Alfred Bernhard Nobel. The fund amounts to over $8,000,000 and the five prizes closely approximate $40,000 each. Those for physics and chemistry are awarded by the Academy of Sciences of Sweden, that for medicine by the Caralus Institute of Stockholm, and the literary prize by the Swedish Academy. The peace prize is awarded annually at Christiania, Norway, by a committee of five chosen from the Norwegian Storthing.

Others receiving awards were: For chemistry, Mme. Marie Sklodowska Curie, famous for being with her husband the co-discoverer of radium. For medicine, Prof. Allvar Gullstrand, of Upsala University in Sweden.

PUTS CONVICTS ON HONOR

An interesting experiment in the humane treatment of convicts has met with the success that it deserves and its author, Governor West, of Oregon, at first regarded as a sentimental enthusiast on prison reform, is now receiving the plaudits of those who would be doing something for the "under dog."

Salem is the center for a number of the state institutions, all of which have considerable tillable ground surrounding them—hundreds of acres of rich arable valley land ready to return to its cultivators abundant harvests of golden wheat. It was Governor West's self-imposed task to bring to this work the hundreds of strong, naturally active men shut up in the penitentiary, and at the same time to establish a system which would be of mutual benefit to the state and to the convict. The governor declares that sentiment had nothing whatever to do with it.

The system has worked admirably whether the men have been employed at farming, roadmaking, brickmaking or in the shops.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Our Diplomats and Their Small Pay

—AND THEY EXPECT ME TO UPHOLD THE DIGNITY OF THE UNITED STATES ON THAT

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State Philander C. Knox is a vigorous advocate of government appropriations sufficiently generous to provide for the erection in foreign capitals of embassies and legations such as would be a credit to the United States as a great nation. He also pleads for a liberal increase in salaries, arguing that it is unfair to expect an ambassador to delve deeply into his own pocket to pay expenses while representing the government abroad. Under present circumstances poor but eminently capable men are barred from high place in diplomatic service. Ridicule it as we may, a certain amount of ostentation, or, at least, a lack of any too evident necessity for economy, is almost compulsory for an American dealing with foreign courts unless, and such cases are rare, he be a man of very remarkable personality.

One may have a hearty contempt for the demands of fashion and possess an innate love for a hickory shirt and corduroy trousers, but he will find himself uncomfortable at exclusive society functions in such garb, if, indeed, he be admitted at all. Similarly, the American diplomat unable to compete in entertainment, at least to a modest degree, with the representatives of other countries will find himself seriously handicapped.

We pay our ambassadors $17,500 per year whether they are sent to Mexico or Turkey or to Germany or Great Britain. It probably costs Whitelaw Reid ten times that amount to live in London, his house rent alone exceeding his salary. Our ministers are paid from $10,000 to $12,000 per year, whether they have to live in Haiti or Spain.

Census Shows Big Shortage of Women

THE female of the species is less numerous than the male, according to a census bulletin, giving the distribution of the population of the United States according to sex. The enumeration taken as of April 15, 1910, showed that in the United States as a whole there were 47,332,122 males and 44,640,144 females, or a proportion of 106 males for every 100 females. Moreover the men are increasing their lead.

In only five states and the District of Columbia do the women and girls outnumber the men and boys. Here is their relative strength:

State.	Males.	Females.
Messachusetts	1,655,226	1,711,190
Rhode Island	270,359	277,251
Maryland	644,225	651,121
District of Columbia	158,050	173,019
North Carolina	1,098,471	1,107,816
South Carolina	751,842	763,558

Ten years ago the females outnumbered the males in five other states—

HANNAH MATILDA — I THINK WE STILL HAVE A CHANCE TO FIND A HUSBAND

New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Virginia and Georgia. Now the tables are turned. The bulletin says in part:

"At birth the number of males always exceeds the number of females, but male mortality is always greater than female. Consequently through the excess of male deaths, the number of females gradually approaches that of males and in the later years of life exceeds it. The negroes, with their greater death rate, show the same result as is observed in European countries, namely, an appreciable excess of females in the population both in 1910 and 1900."

Uncle Sam is Held Up in Buying Fuel

THAT the United States government is "held up" and made to pay exorbitant prices for coal and oil for fuel is the charge made by Brigadier General J. B. Aleshire, quartermaster general of the army, in his annual report.

By law, fuel supplies for the army must be purchased under the bidding system, the lowest bidder getting the contract. General Aleshire says that under the present system bidders communicate the amount of their bids to one another.

The general asks that congress give him authority to use his discretion in purchasing fuel, so that the government may escape the present system of excessive prices. Such authority has already been granted to officers of the navy department.

As an example of the excessive prices demanded and obtained under the bidding system, General Aleshire cites the case of the transport Burnside, operating between the Pacific coast and the Philippines.

On one occasion it was necessary to coal the Burnside under an emergency without asking bids. In open market coal was purchased at $3.60 a ton, for 400 tons. Previously the army had paid $5.25 a ton for the same grade of coal, under the bidding system. Four hundred dollars was saved on the one purchase, and it is estimated that by buying regularly in the open market $9,000 a year could be saved in coal purchases for this vessel alone. Similar conditions prevail on the Atlantic coast and also in the purchases of anthracite coal for use in army posts.

Considerable progress is being made in the movement to eliminate the army mule and substitute the auto truck, according to General Aleshire. It has already been found, after careful investigation and experiment, that the auto truck is more economical and more efficient when used in cities and over good roads. Three such trucks are now being used at San Francisco, one at Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; one at West Point, N. Y., and seven in Manila. Efforts are now being made to obtain a truck which will replace the animal-drawn wagon with troops in the field.

Dead Letter Office Auctions Off Mail

NEARLY 10,000 packages containing a year's accumulation of articles of all sorts from the division of dead letters of the postoffice department were put on sale the other day by C. G. Sloan & Co., auctioneers, and when the auctioneer began a hard week's task by singing out the contents of package No. 1 a crowd of several hundred people had gathered to regale themselves with the excitement of the sale and perhaps to profit by its terms. Package No. 1 contained "two man's handkerchiefs, with initials E. K., a necktie, two pairs of hose, size 11, and a clothes brush," and went to a girl in a picture hat, who evidently was looking for Christmas presents "for him."

The sale continued daily until the whole lot was disposed of. The auctioneer had no easy task before him, as he had to work hard and sing-song vehemently every second. The terms are cash on delivery, and two active porters were kept busy engaged running to and fro with packages and money.

AUCTION
GIVE ME A BID — THESE TEETH ARE IN FINE SHAPE —

The bulk of the goods was in the miscellaneous schedule, and were miscellaneous in the truest sense of the word. Everything from an infant's zephyr sack to a gold-filled false tooth was scheduled. For example, lot 785 contained twenty-five damaged cigars, three handkerchiefs, two pairs of socks and twelve adjustable tobacco pipe covers.

Musical instruments were scattered throughout the list in profusion, and neckties by the bale were offered to the highest bidder. Scores of cheap jewelry articles were for sale, and at the end of the miscellaneous list appeared hardware and electrotypes.

A list of books, most of it interesting fiction, appeared in schedule B.

"At birth the number of males always exceeds the number of females, but male mortality is always greater than female. Consequently through the excess of male deaths, the number of females gradually approaches that of males and in the later years of life exceeds it. The negroes, with their greater death rate, show the same result as is observed in European countries, namely, an appreciable excess of females in the population both in 1910 and 1900."

Uncle Sam is Held Up in Buying Fuel

THAT the United States government is "held up" and made to pay exorbitant prices for coal and oil for fuel is the charge made by Brigadier General J. B. Aleshire, quartermaster general of the army, in his annual report.

By law, fuel supplies for the army must be purchased under the bidding system, the lowest bidder getting the contract. General Aleshire says that under the present system bidders communicate the amount of their bids to one another.

The general asks that congress give him authority to use his discretion in purchasing fuel, so that the government may escape the present system of excessive prices. Such authority has already been granted to officers of the navy department.

As an example of the excessive prices demanded and obtained under the bidding system, General Aleshire cites the case of the transport Burnside, operating between the Pacific coast and the Philippines.

On one occasion it was necessary to coal the Burnside under an emergency without asking bids. In open market coal was purchased at $3.60 a ton, for 400 tons. Previously the army had paid $5.25 a ton for the same grade of coal, under the bidding system. Four hundred dollars was saved on the one purchase, and it is estimated that by buying regularly in the open market $9,000 a year could be saved in coal purchases for this vessel alone. Similar conditions prevail on the Atlantic coast and also in the purchases of anthracite coal for use in army posts.

Considerable progress is being made in the movement to eliminate the army mule and substitute the auto truck, according to General Aleshire. It has already been found, after careful investigation and experiment, that the auto truck is more economical and more efficient when used in cities and over good roads. Three such trucks are now being used at San Francisco, one at Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; one at West Point, N. Y., and seven in Manila. Efforts are now being made to obtain a truck which will replace the animal-drawn wagon with troops in the field.

Dead Letter Office Auctions Off Mail

AUCTION

NEARLY 10,000 packages containing a year's accumulation of articles of all sorts from the division of dead letters of the postoffice department were put on sale the other day by C. G. Sloan & Co., auctioneers, and when the auctioneer began a hard week's task by singing out the contents of package No. 1 a crowd of several hundred people had gathered to regale themselves with the excitement of the sale and perhaps to profit by its terms. Package No. 1 contained "two man's handkerchiefs, with initials E. K., a necktie, two pairs of hose, size 11, and a clothes brush," and went to a girl in a picture hat, who evidently was looking for Christmas presents "for him."

The sale continued daily until the whole lot was disposed of. The auctioneer had no easy task before him, as he had to work hard and sing-song vehemently every second. The terms were cash on delivery, and two active porters were kept busy engaged running to and fro with packages and money.

The bulk of the goods was in the miscellaneous schedule, and were miscellaneous in the truest sense of the word. Everything from an infant's zephyr sack to a gold-filled false tooth was scheduled. For example, lot 785 contained twenty-five damaged cigars, three handkerchiefs, two pairs of socks and twelve adjustable tobacco pipe covers.

Musical instruments were scattered throughout the list in profusion, and neckties by the bale were offered to the highest bidder. Scores of cheap jewelry articles were for sale, and at the end of the miscellaneous list appeared hardware and electrotypes.

A list of books, most of it interesting fiction, appeared in schedule B.

ALLAYING A SCARE.

It takes precious little, sometimes, to start a serious "scare." The merest irresponsible rumor may result in a run on a bank, and a hint of fire may precipitate a disastrous panic. In fact, it might be difficult to disprove a statement, if made, that we mortals thoroughly enjoy being scared, and welcome the agency by which this end may be accomplished. As an instance of the popular love for a scare may be cited the readily-credited reports, the source of which no one seems to know, that all nickels dated 1910 were counterfeit, says the Manchester Union. The treasury department at Washington has received hundreds of inquiries from all sections of the country, on the strength of these reports, and the persistency with which the reports have spread has occasioned banks and business men much inconvenience. As a matter of fact, there are 30,000,000 nickels of 1910 in circulation, and, so far as the treasury department knows, all are genuine. Some of them were discolored in the minting, by fumes of sulphuric acid, which gives them an unusual appearance. This fact may have afforded apparent grounds for the "counterfeit" report, which is itself bogus. The nickels are good for five cents each, and there is no occasion for shying at them.

His incorrigible activity in various parts of the globe has given the war god much to answer for during the last few months; but with gods as with men it can perhaps be said that there is some good in the worst of the species. In behalf of Mars, for example, it may not be amiss to put forth the extenuating circumstance that his restlessness has at least added mightily to the geographical erudition of mortal men, says the Boston Herald. Take Agadir, for instance. Every one knows where it is now. But three months ago only a daring intellect would have vouched for its location on the Atlantic rather than upon the Mediterranean. Amoy, likewise, has been located for us, far to the south of Shanghai, where in our ignorance we least expected to find it. By the same token, we have been introduced to millions of our liberty-loving friends in the provinces of Hunan, Hupeh and Hu-knows where else.

Increasing frequency of deaths by poison compels the conclusion that it would be better for the community if deadly drugs were less easily obtained. Nearly every day's news carries its story of murder or suicide by poison. In many cases the crimes are made possible by the sale of drugs that under no circumstances should be sold indiscriminately. Evidence in these cases almost invariably shows that the criminals purchased the death potion with the same ease and lack of restriction that would attend the sale of a bar of soap, says the Chicago Journal. More rigid regulation of the sale of deadly poisons might not put a stop to these crimes, but it certainly would make them more difficult. At the least legislatures would do well to prohibit the sale of sudden death in the shape of cyanide of potassium, and other similar drugs, except to physicians and those who are known to have a legitimate use for them.

The final settlement of the so-called German potash dispute out of court, so to speak, is a decided triumph for sane diplomacy. Those who may recall the histrionics which attended the discussion of this question nearly a year ago, the hysterical demand for a tariff war with Germany, the impassioned denunciation of Germany and the appeals to the department of state to wield "the big stick" may be surprised to find the announcement of a final settlement, apparently satisfactory to all concerned, in a brief cablegram from Berlin.

The Journal of the American Medical Association warns against the use of thyroid as an obesity cure. It is dangerous because it reduces protein as well as fat, and has been known to bring on serious illness. Most cases of undue weight are due to overeating, or lack of sufficient exercise, or both. The safest treatment for obesity is abstemiousness combined with exercise—not too violent, for that might injure the heart.

DR. SEN IS PRESIDENT

DELEGATES TO MEET AT NANKIN AND CHOOSE REFORMER FOR FIRST PRESIDENT.

ALREADY ORGANIZING A CABINET

Yuan Shi Kai Takes Sick Leave.—Russians Want China to Continue in Control of Mongolia.

Shanghai, China. — An imperial edict will not be accepted by the revolutionaries except in the most liberal form under which a republic can be established without delay, or unless it provides for the recognition of the provisional government of which Dr. Sun Yat Sen was elected president at the regular convention of the Nanking conference at which 18 delegates appointed by the governors of the provinces or by the provincial assemblies, will act in behalf of China proper.

Dr. Sun Yat Sen has made preparations to organize his cabinet. It is believed that the first ministry will be strong and may include some of Yuan Shi Kai's delegates, who accompanied Teng Sheo Yi, the premier's representative, to the peace conference.

The revolutionary leaders here laugh at the apparent struggle of Yuan Shi Kai, the imperial premier, to temporize with the situation, which they declare has passed out of his control.

Disgusted at the refusal of the imperial clan to contribute to the war chest, Yuan Shai Kai last night took sick leave. It is believed this presages his early retirement from the premiership. He bitterly resents the bad faith of Wu Ting Fang and his party in proposing a national congress and now insisting upon a rump, not a representative, congress. Yuan fears that a republic means the country's dissolution, and believes the only sane solution is to fight it out, but he is handicapped by lack of money.

China Ordered to Keep Mongolia.

Pekin.—In response to a direct request of the Russian government, handed to the Chinese foreign office by the Russian charge d'affaires that China should promptly resume control of Mongolia, the Chinese government declared its inability to comply at the present moment.

The only action the government is able to take regarding Mongolia, the independence of which has been proclaimed, is the appointment of two commissioners who have been ordered to proceed by way of the trans-Siberian railway to Urga, the chief city, to persuade the Mongol authorities, if possible, to renew their allegiance to China.

The kutuktu, who is the religious head of the Mongol Buddhists, was proclaimed khan.

According to the Lama doctrine, this dignitary—the kutuktu—is the terrestial impersonation of the godhead and never dies, but passed after his apparent decease into the body of some newly born boy, who is sought for afterwards according to the prophetic indications of the Delai Lama in Thibet. The independence movement is largely religious.

The dissatisfaction of the Mongolian people has been long standing, the Russians say, owing to Chinese incapacity and corruption. The Chinese ambans, or governors, have always plundered the Mongols and enriched themselves, while at the same time carrying on an unjust administration.

Russia does not intend to declare a protectorate and refused the Mongol appeal for the establishment of a protectorate last July. Such a declaration might cause objection on the part of the other powers, while in fact something like a protectorate already exists in the association of Russian and Mongolian Buddhists.

The attaches of Japan and Great Britain may be expected to watch events closely, but there will be no cause of alarm until Russian troops cross the Gobi desert. The construction later of the Baikal-Kalgan railway might necessitate the employment of Russian troops for protection as was the case along the trans-Siberian railway in Manchuria, but that is a consideration for the future. The present step apparently is only diplomatic in the Russian program of expansion which did not terminate with the treaty of Portsmouth.

Revolutionists of Twenty Per.

PUT BLAME ON EMPLOYERS

American Federation Leaders Declare Industrial Conditions Responsible for Dynamite Outrages—Court Investigation of Their Books.

Washington.—That labor unions have no desire to condone the crimes of which the McNamara brothers recently pleaded guilty at Los Angeles is the declaration of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor in a letter to unions of the United States. The statement is signed by the ways and means committee, which was named to raise the McNamara defense fund.

Contained in the statement is the following criticism of the McNameras:

"Organized labor of America has no desire to condone the crimes of the McNamaras. It joins in the satisfaction that the majesty of the law and justice has been maintained and the culprits punished commensurately for their crime.

"It is cruelly unjust to hold the men of the labor movement either legally or morally responsible for the crime of an individual member. No such moral code or legal responsibility is placed upon any other association of men in our country.

"In so far as we have the right to speak, in the name of organized labor, we welcome any investigation which either federal or state courts may undertake. The sessions of the conventions of the American Federation of Labor are held with open doors that all may see and hear what is being said and done. The books, accounts and correspondence of the federation are open to any competent authority who may desire to make a study of them. Will the National Manufacturers' association, the Erectors' association and the detective agencies extend the same privilege for public investigation and examination of their books and correspondence?"

Blame for conditions which produce such men as the McNamaras is thrown upon employers.

Teharan, Persia.—The cabinet has notified St. Petersburg that W. Morgan Shuster, the American treasurer general has been dismissed and signified its acceptance of all the Russian demands. This followed the unlooked for dissolution of the Mejliss by the regent's firman.

Members of the dissolved Mejliss are indignant at the action of the regent and the cabinet and excitement runs high throughout the city. Fearing an outbreak soldiers have been posted around the parliament buildings, guarding all approaches.

Mr. Shuster has not yet been officially notified of the adverse action of the cabinet and continues to hold the fort. The members of the Mejliss are planning to send a deputation to beg that Shuster retain his office in defiance of the cabinet. Popular feeling is strong in support of Mr. Shuster.

Count Boni's anxiety to have the marriage set aside was due, it is said, to a desire to marry an heiress who insisted on a church ceremony.

PACT IS EXPOSED

PACKERS ATTORNEY PRODUCES CONTRACT FOR LOAN WHICH HELPED FORM TRUST.

WITNESS NAMES E. H. GARY

Noted New York Financiers Are Mentioned in Court as Backers of Proposed Gigantic Merger of Chicago Meat Firms.

Chicago.—P. A. Valentine, former treasurer for Armour & Co., and E. H. Gary, chairman of the board of the United States Steel corporation, figured conspicuously in the trial of the ten indicted Chicago packers charged with violating the Sherman anti-trust act.

The names of the two financiers came out when Pierce Butler, assistant to the attorney general, questioned Albert H. Veeder, former counsel for Swift & Co., regarding contract No. 7, which provided for a loan of $15,000,000 in the formation of the National Packing company.

The reading of the agreement showed that Mr. Gary was to take over all the assets of the packers in consideration for the loan. Mr. Valentine signed the agreement in behalf of J. Ogden Armour.

The old pool of packers, it developed, was known only as "P. O. Box 247." Mr. Veeder testified that he knew of no name for the association, but it was said that "P. O. Box 247" was the mysterious name under which the pool worked.

The merger of the following plants by the Chicago packers, he said, became known later as the National Packing company: United Dressed Beef company of New York, Fowler Packing company, Hammond Packing company, and St. Louis Dressed Beef and Provision company.

Veeder was asked why the Chicago packers did not take over the firm of Schwarzschild & Sulzberger business in November, 1902, as contemplated. Mr. Veeder explained that the $500,000,000 merger of the packers was in progress, but that the financial strain of 1903 prevented the promoters from securing a loan of $90,000,000 from New York bankers to carry the deal through.

Kuhn, Loeb & Co., as managers of the syndicate, were to receive either one-fifth of the syndicate's profits or one per cent. of its par value.

After James Stillman, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and E. H. Harriman failed to produce the $90,000,000, Mr. Veeder said a loan of $15,000,000 was made by the same financiers in July, 1903, for the formation of the National Packing company.

The Illinois Trust and Savings bank had been made trustee to all the contracts entered into by J. Ogden Armour, Edward Morris and Gustavus Swift in 1902, according to the testimony of the witness.

A loan of $8,000,000 from the First National bank made to the Armour, Swift and Morris interests toward the formation of the National Packing company was also revealed.

Receipts shown by Attorney Veeder disclosed that the Morris, Swift, Armour and Cudahy interests deposited with the Illinois Trust and Savings bank $4,000,000 as a matter of good faith when the $500,000,000 merger was contemplated in 1902.

The agreements between the packers and the bank relative to the deposits were read into record.

An agreement on July 18, 1902, which made Michael Cudahy a party to the contemplated $500,000,000 merger also was introduced.

The government intends to show that the National Packing company paid back the loan of $15,000,000 with accrued interest to the New York and Chicago financiers three years from the date of the loan in 1902.

AIM TO BAR OUT U. S. JEWS

Duma Bill Wants Russia to Raise Custom Duties 100 Per Cent.—Slap at America.

St. Petersburg.—All American Jews will be forbidden entrance to Russia if a bill introduced in the duma by the Nationalists becomes law. Not only this, but further retaliation for the abrogation of the treaty of 1832 by the United States is provided.

Custom duties are to be raised 100 per cent. unless the Russian normal schedule is lower than the American. In that case a duty equaling the American duty will be collected.

The author of the bill states that the last provision of the bill is necessary in order to deal with the importation of American agricultural machinery. The remaining points of the proposed bill correspond in virtually every particular with the bill introduced December 22 by ex-President Guchkoff, providing for tariff schedules applicable to the United States at the expiration of the Russo-American commerce and navigation treaty of 1832.

REYES TO FACE TRIAL

REBEL LEADER WILL BE CHARGED WITH SEDITION.

Madero Promises That He and Followers Who Surrender Will Have Impartial Military Court.

Mexico City. — General Bernardo Reyes, the aged rebel general who surrendered because he could rally only a handful of men to his standard, will be tried for sedition before a military tribunal.

The judge before whom he will appear will be chosen with a view to selecting an impartial magistrate and one that bears him no personal enmity.

The end of the week probably will see General Reyes occupying a cell in the penitentiary of the federal district in the portion set apart for political prisoners.

An order that he be brought to the national capital was transmitted by the minister of the interior to Gen. Geronimo Trevino at Monterey. The commander of the Third military zone probably will assign an escort of rurales to General Reyes and also give him a safe conduct to Mexico City.

His followers who lay down their arms, will be treated in a like manner, while those who do not surrender unconditionally will be hunted down relentlessly.

These were declarations made by President Madero at Chepultepec. The surrender of Reyes, said the president, was a surprise to himself and his ministers. They had expected the rebel leader would be able to find some few followers, but his declaration that "not one person had been willing to espouse his cause" was even more than they had anticipated.

SYNOPSIS.

A foolish young tenderfoot becomes fascinated with the bold, artful wife of a drunken prospector in a western mining town. They prepare to elope in a blinding blizzard but are confronted by the maudlin husband. He is shot by the wife, but the chivalrous boy pins a note to the body taking the crime upon himself. In their flight to the railroad station the woman's horse falls exhausted; the youth puts her on his own and follows hanging to the stirrup strap. Seeing he is an impediment, the woman thrusts her escort into a snow drift and rides on. Half-frozen he stumbles into the railroad station just as the train bears the woman away. Twenty-five years later, this man, George Gormly, is a multi-millionaire in New York. He meets Eleanor Haldane, a beautiful and wealthy settlement worker, and co-operates with her in her work. Gormly becomes owner of a steamship line and finds himself frustrated in pier and track extension plans by grafting aldermen, backed by the Gotham Traction company. An automobile accident brings the Haldanes to his country home. Gormly announces that he will be mayor of New York and redeem the city from corruption. The political declaration of the merchant prince produced a tremendous sensation. The whole machinery of the city's detective force is to be used to dig up something damaging to Gormly. The press heretofore unanimously favorable to the merchant candidate, under pressure, divides and the campaign waxes warm. A resolution is introduced granting a gratuitous renewal of the traction franchise. Gormly offers ten million dollars for the franchise. Miss Haldane congratulates Gormly on what she terms a new Declaration of Independence, and he makes an unexpected declaration of love. He is shocked by the confirmation of his suspicions that her father is the head and backbone of the notorious traction company which he is attempting to overthrow. Young Haldane discovers his father's connection with the Gotham Traction company, and is incensed. In an interview between Gormly and Haldane the latter practically offers his daughter's hand as a bribe for Gormly to withdraw. Gormly refuses. In an interview with Gormly Miss Haldane learns of her father's baseness though Gormly vainly tries to hide it. Members of the Ring find the woman for whose sake Gormly declared himself a murderer and decide to force him to withdraw under threat of prosecution.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Chief of Police Visits Mr. Gormly.

On the evening of the second day before the election Connell, dressed in plain clothes and entirely unaccompanied, presented himself very late at night at Gormly's apartment and desired to see him. It was Somes who admitted the official. Gormly's establishment was a simple one, and the other servants had gone home for the night.

Somes knew very well who he was, and while he had some of the English awe of the police he had all the hatred of a zealous and devoted partizan of his master, which he certainly was, for the enemy. Therefore he requested the functionary to take a seat while he carried the request for an interview to the library.

Somes entered the library without knocking, a most unusual course for him. He also took occasion to turn the key of the door behind him. Then he stood at attention in his respectful English way. Gormly had looked up instantly the door was opened, and had stopped his dictation. He was greatly surprised at the valet's entrance, and more surprised when he locked the door; but he realized that something unusual was up and said nothing.

"Beg pardon, sir," began Somes deprecatingly, "but there's a party out in the hall wants to see you."

"Who is it?"

"He didn't give any name, sir, but I recognized him as the chief of police."

"Yes, sir."

"What does he want?"

"He didn't say, sir."

"What was his message?"

"Just to tell you that a gentleman—that's what he called himself, sir—wanted to see you."

"Where is he now?"

"I left him sitting out in the hall, but I wouldn't be too sure as to where he is, sir. He seemed to want to come right in here without permission, and that's why I locked the door, sir."

"I see," answered Gormly, a twinkle of amusement in his eye. "I wonder what the chief of police can have to say to me? Well, I suppose I'd better see him. Chaloner, will you go into the dining room and wait until I call for you. Tell the chief to come in, Somes."

While Chaloner gathered up his notebooks, pencils, and letters and withdrew into the dining room across the hall, Somes unlocked the door, stepped out into the hall and presently returned. He threw the door of the library open in great style, drew himself up and announced as if it had been a reigning prince:

"The chief of police of the city of New York!"

"To what," asked Gormly suavely, "am I indebted for the honor of this visit at this late hour?"

He glanced at the clock as he spoke and observed that it was half-after eleven.

"I've got something to say to you, Gormly," began Connell brusqly.

"I am not aware of any intimacy between you and me, Mr. Connell, which warrants you in your familiar mode of address. Address me with decency and respect, or I'll have you put out of the house!"

"Me!" roared Connell. "You'd lay hands on me, an officer of the law, in the discharge of his—"

"Are you come here as an officer of the law in the discharge of your duty? If so, will you please tell me without further delay what you want, where is your warrant and incidentally inform me why you come in plain clothes?"

"Never mind how I come or why I come!" said Connell wrathfully. "As I said, I've got something to say to you,"—he paused for a moment—"Mr. Gormly, if that's your name. I'm going to say it, and you're going to listen!"

"Am I?" said Gormly. "You see that bell?" He pointed to one of the buttons in the big desk in the library. "I have only to press that to have two men here instantly. The three of us are quite equal to throwing you out of the apartment, and two of us, I know, would be more than willing to do it. I think I have had about enough of you, anyway."

"Well, I don't leave till I've had my say, George Fordyce!" was the answer.

In spite of himself Gormly started. He controlled himself instantly, however.

"You seem," he said coolly enough, "to have discovered my middle name, which I dropped for reasons that seemed good to me when I came to New York."

"For reasons that seemed good to you!" sneered the big officer. "I guess they were good to you!"

"What do you know about them?" asked Gormly quietly.

"I know what they were."

"And it is to tell me what you know that you came here tonight?"

"Not by any means. It's to tell you what you've got to do that I'm here."

"And what have I got to do?"

"And If I Do This, Asked Gormly, What Do I Get?"

"You've got to withdraw from this campaign now, tonight."

"And how do you propose that I should withdraw?"

"Set down there and write that for business reasons you've concluded to withdraw from the campaign; that you advise your friends to vote for Pete Warren, the best mayor New York ever had; that you're convinced that you were wrong in the charges you've made; that investigation has showed you that the Gotham Freight Traction company is all right and that the Sachem society is equally honorable and virtuous. You'll know how to put it. I give you the substance. Fancy it up in your own language. You can sling words good and plenty as has been proved in this campaign. That's all you got to do."

"And if I do this," asked Gormly, "what do I get?"

"You'll get silence as to your doings twenty-five years ago."

"Would you mind telling me what my doings were twenty-five years ago?"

"Certainly not," said the chief. "No reason for concealment between you and me, that I can see. You ran away with a miner's wife out at Camp Kill Devil, Wyo., in the midst of a howlin' blizzard. With the wife you took the man's pile, product of his hard-workin', toilsome life for a worthless woman and you. And before you left, you put a bullet into the man's breast. [illegible] theft, 'dultery, murder. You'll make a hell of a reform mayor, won't you? How'd the people enjoy that?"

"Why are you offering me anything, if you possess this power and are confident as to your information? Why don't you publish this stuff and knock me out without giving me any chance to withdraw?"

"See here, Gormly, it ain't for you to question! It's for you to do what you're told. We've decided that this is the way this scheme is goin' to be worked, that's all there is to it. If we have our reasons for not publishin' the stuff, why they're ours; they're not yours.

"Why, man, all I've got to do is to go down to the district attorney and swear out a warrant to have you arrested for murder. We've got our fingers on the woman you run away with—and a pretty lookin' old hag she is now, too. She don't want to be mixed up in it; but we've got hold of her, and if necessary she'll swear that you done it. We've located several people that used to live in Camp Kill Devil who remember the circumstances. One of 'em said, and the woman corroborates it, that you wrote an acknowledgment with your own hand, sayin' that you shot up the man, and you left it in the cabin. Maybe we can turn that up, too. It's all as clear as day. I don't really know why I stay here talkin' about it any longer, except I rather enjoy seein' you squirm."

"Have you seen me squirm any yet, chief?"

"No, not yet; but I can imagine how you're feelin' beneath that iron composure of yours. I've had to deal with too many blackguards and criminals not to know that. Well," the man threw up his hands, laid down his cigar and yawned prodigiously, "it's gittin' late. I'll take that withdrawal and go."

"Wouldn't it be better for me to have my secretary here?" said Gormly, "and dictate what I have to say? Let him make a number of carbon copies of it, so that we could send it to all the papers."

"Well, if you want to let your secretary in on this game, I don't see that I've got any objections," said the chief.

Gormly stepped to the door.

"Mr. Chaloner," he said, "will you bring your notebook and pencils here? Mr. Chaloner, this is the chief of police, Mr. Connell," he continued, as the young man entered the room.

"Pleased to know you," said Connell grimly.

"Will you be seated, Mr. Chaloner, and take a statement from my dictation? By the way," he pushed a button on the desk, and the door into the hall opened instantly, with suspicious promptness, it might have been thought, had any of the party given it any attention, "Somes," said Gormly, "I want you." The servant stepped into the room. "Lock the door, please, so that I may be sure we are not interrupted."

"Now," said Gormly, "this gentleman, as you know, is the chief of police."

"Yes, sir," said Somes.

"He has asked me to dictate a certain statement to the people of the city of New York, and I'd like to have you hear what I have to say and witness all that occurs."

"Yes, sir."

"Are you ready, Mr. Chaloner?"

"Quite ready, sir."

"Tonight at half after eleven o'clock," began Gormly, "the chief of police of the city of New York—"

"You needn't bring me into it!" roared Connell, sitting up.

"Will you have the goodness to be silent, sir?" cried Gormly. "I am dictating this statement, not you." [illegible]

"I say," thundered the chief, slamming his big hand down on the desk, "or I'll—"

"Keep back there, Somes," said Gormly sharply as the man stepped forward, his face aflame. "I can deal with the man. Connell," he continued, "you are going to sit right there until I've finished with you. Now, Somes," he said, "you stand right behind him, and if he attempts to get out of his chair keep him down."

"You're assaulting an officer of the law!" roared the chief, snapping his fingers.

"You ought to be man enough to know that the game's against you so far," said Gormly, "and keep quiet until I get through. Then I'll give you a chance to talk. Are you ready now, Mr. Chaloner?"

"Quite ready, sir," was the imperturbable answer of that most excellent young man.

"I'll begin again:

"Tonight at half after eleven o'clock Ben Connell, the chief of police of the city of New York, called at my apartment. He came unaccompanied and wearing plain clothes. The object of his visit was to demand of me that I should withdraw as a candidate for the mayor of New York; that I should request the people who had honored me with their support to vote for Warren; that I should declare my belief in the integrity of the Gotham Freight Traction company and the purity of the Sachem society, of which he is an honored member. The means by which he sought to induce me to take this course were a promise of silence as to certain episodes in my past career, and a threat of instant publicity, including a possible arrest if I refused. In the presence of my private secretary, Philip Chaloner, of my friend and servant, William Somes, and of the chief of police, Connell himself, I am dictating this statement.

"Twenty-five years ago I came to New York. Since that time my career has been thoroughly exploited. The detective force of the city, supplemented by whatever talent could be procured or suborned, has had me under investigation. To not one act have they been able to point of which I am ashamed, or upon which they could fix an attack.

"When I came to New York I was nineteen years of age. I was born in Vermont. I received a common school education, graduating from the high school when I was sixteen. My father died before I was born, my mother at my birth. Some small property accruing to me was turned over to me by my guardian on my graduation from the high school. I spent two years at sea as a cabin boy, and then drifted west, finally bringing up at Kill Devil Camp in Wyoming.

"There I came under the influence of a woman older than I, who thought it not unbecoming to her to beguile and entrap the young eastern tenderfoot who was just entering upon his nineteenth year. I was young, inexperienced, impressionable; I fell completely under her influence. There is something to be said for her, poor woman. She was married to a drunken brute of a husband, a miner, a gambler, who was not only unfaithful to her, but who abused her frightfully. I think my sympathies more than my affections were engaged. I had a chivalric desire to help her, a boy's reverence for womankind abused and suffering, a quixotic spirit of knight errantry, of which even now I am not ashamed.

"I had still some little money left, and resolved to take her away from her intolerable life. I do not wish to shelter myself behind a woman; but I have always told the people of New York the exact truth, and I am doing it now. We had planned to leave the camp on a certain night and ride south to the Union Pacific. That night was the night of the great blizzard of 1882, which is still remembered in the west. It was very late when I reached her cabin with the horses. The woman was ready for me, waiting eagerly in fact. Her husband had recently won a small sum of money by gambling. That money she took with her.

"We had turned to the door to go out, although it was almost certain death to be abroad in such a storm, when her husband entered the room. How he knew, or whether he knew, what we were going to do, I cannot say. At any rate, he was there. He covered me with a gun; I was entirely helpless.

"I worked in a desperate hurry, and at last got my hand on the butt of my pistol. I saw from the look of his eye that I would have little time to draw it. I realized that unless I could I was a doomed man. At that instant there was a flash and a report in the room. Immediately after the man pulled the trigger of his own pistol, but the bullet went wild. He sank down on his knees, and fell back dying. I dropped my own weapon and bent over him. There was a hole in his breast through which the blood was oozing."

"Who shot him?" growled the chief, who had been listening with the greatest absorption to the narrative.

"The woman shot him," answered Gormly. "But you need not put that in, Chaloner. Let it go as I have dictated it." He resumed to his stenographer:

"There was nothing that I could do for the man. It was more than ever necessary that we get away. In pity for the woman, I tore a blank leaf from a book and wrote upon it that I had shot this man. We left that note on the body and plunged into the storm. Words cannot convey the frightful nature of the tempest. We became separated in the [illegible]

Colbrook's Burglar

By CATHERINE COOPE

Cynthia threw herself, hot and exhausted, into a big chair in the drawing room.

"Can't you find it?" her mother asked anxiously.

"Not a sign of it," Cynthia cried tearfully, "and I simply cannot go to the masquerade without it. I have looked the whole house over."

"Has it ever occurred to you, dear," suggested Mrs. Mede, "that you might have left it in the apartment?"

"Mother! That is exactly where I did leave it—in that cubby hole place above the wardrobe in papa's room! I remember putting it there so that it would be out of the way. I go to masquerades so seldom that I had forgotten all about my lovely costume. If I hurry I can get the next train to town and get it!"

"But, my dear, the apartment has no doubt been rented by this time—furnished apartments don't remain empty long."

"We have only been out of it a week. Anyway—I can only try and it is too late to make another costume for the dance." Cynthia was up and flying about the house for hat, coat and mileage before her mother could remonstrate further.

"I will be back as soon as the Long Island trains can take me to town and back!" she cried as she kissed her mother.

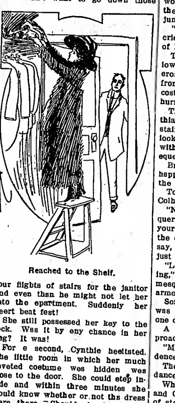
Arriving in New York, Cynthia made her way to the apartment that her parents had occupied for the past three months.

The hall boy was nowhere to be seen and Cynthia went up the stairs feeling very much at home. The apartment was the only one on the top floor. Had she thought, before making the ascent, Cynthia would have asked the janitor if the apartment were rented, but now that she was at the top she could find out for herself.

The name-plate bore the name 'Colbrook.' Cynthia stood still a moment to collect her nerves. It was rather a hard task, now that she was on the threshold, but she simply must have her masquerade costume if it was in that apartment to have.

Cynthia rang the bell! She rang a second time—and a third.

No one answered. Cynthia drooped. She didn't want to go down those four flights of stairs for the janitor and even then he might not let her into the apartment. Suddenly her heart beat fast!



Reached to the Shelf.

She still possessed her key to the lock. Was it by any chance in her bag? It was!

For a second, Cynthia hesitated. The little room in which her much coveted costume was hidden was close to the door. She could step inside and within three minutes she would know whether or not the dress were there. Should she be caught Cynthia felt that she could very easily explain her action. Surely any reasonable family would understand.

She found the key, inserted it in the lock and stood within the door.

Cynthia left the key on the outside of the door. It would be much quicker. She went swiftly to the wardrobe, stood on tip-toe and managed by straining to open the high door.

She drew a great breath of delight! Her costume—at least she could see a tiny bit of pink—was there.

Feeling very much like a burglar, yet strangely at home in the familiar apartment, Cynthia slipped lightly along the hall and entered the kitchen.

The cubby in the wardrobe was high and Cynthia was not. She knew that there was a chair step-ladder in the kitchen. She made her way back to the small room and hurriedly unfolded the chair and climbed up.

She was in the act of dragging her beautiful pink rosebud costume from the shelf when she screamed and grabbed desperately for the top of the door. The step-ladder had collapsed.

A man was standing gazing at her in blank amazement!

"For goodness sake!" cried Cynthia hanging frantically from the door top, "put that ladder under my foot! I can't hold on another second—quick—please!"

The man stepped swiftly to her side and swung one arm about her waist and held her in a grip of iron.

"You little thief!" he said with a half laugh in his voice and shook her slightly to emphasize his words. He held her, struggling against his side. The pink costume had tumbled and fallen over them both.

Furiously angry Cynthia struggled to free herself, but Colbrook only held her the tighter and without more ceremony carried her up the hall to the front of the apartment.

He set her down in the middle of the dining table. "Now—my little burglar—what are you going to do?" he asked with polite mockery.

"I'm not a burglar!" stormed Cynthia, and a furious color flamed into her cheeks.

"Lady burglars generally say that," commented Colbrook.

"I'm not a lady burglar," insisted Cynthia, very near to tears.

"I most certainly wouldn't take you for a man burglar," said Colbrook.

Cynthia struggled for calm and a moment later looked defiantly into Jim Colbrook's eyes. She felt that she was beautiful to the eyes looking back at her and it gave her courage to be herself—fearless and confident.

"I realize fully that I had not the slightest right in the world to enter this apartment but—" She hesitated and the color again flamed into her face. Colbrook was gazing steadily at her and something in his face told her that he was even then condemning himself.

"I—or rather my family, occupied this apartment—just before you did and in the hurry of moving I left a costume of mine in that wardrobe at the end of the hall." A smile crept into Cynthia's eyes when she remembered herself hanging to the door. Colbrook smiled, but very grimly. "It was a masquerade costume and I needed it for a dance tonight—there was no one in the apartment and as I have my key—"

"Don't say any more." Colbrook had raised a hand. "I already feel that I owe you an apology, but I must ask you to hurry now. This is a bachelor apartment—the rest of the fellows will be home any minute. We are all going out to the country today. If they found you here there would be the deuce—" Colbrook led the way down the hall. Cynthia had jumped hurriedly to her feet.

"I must have my costume!" she cried hurriedly, "but do get me out of here before—"

The door slammed in the hall below and a great noise of whistling arose. Colbrook jerked a suit case from the wardrobe, jammed the pink costume in and with scant ceremony hurried Cynthia out.

The play was none too quick. Cynthia was scarcely down one flight of stairs when she met another good looking man. His arms were loaded with great bundles and Cynthia squeezed narrowly by him.

Breathless, excited, yet strangely happy, Cynthia made her way toward the Pennsylvania station.

Tod Lane, bundles and all got into Colbrook's apartment.

"Next time you fellows want masquerade costumes you can get them yourself!" he sputtered and dropped the costumes he had carried. "But I say, Jim—I met a peach on the stairs just now."

"Let's hope she lives in the building," Colbrook said, and picked up a masquerade costume—a suit of chain armor. "Is this for me?" he asked.

Some few hours later a masquerade was in progress. The scene was in one of the Long Island mansions.

A knight, in chain armor, approached a pink rosebud.

"May I have a dance—three or four dances?" asked the knight.

The pink rosebud gave him her dance order.

When they were circling the room and Colbrook's arm was like a hand of steel around the pink rosebud he bent his head.

"After all," he whispered into the rosebud's heart, "you are a burglar."

A thrill of contentment ran through Cynthia.

"Even so," she declared, "I am not one bit—sorry."

Primitive Marriage Customs.

"Marriage among Wa-Unga of northeast Rhodesia is much less of a formality than among the neighboring tribes; betrothal being unnecessary, and very often the parents know nothing of the marriage," says a writer in the Geographical Journal. "In the old days, before they came under the government, marriage by capture was common, the abduction being done in canoes. In fact, the lake tribes seemed to be continually raiding each other, and among fellow tribesmen, too, capturing sheep, goats and women. Often raids would be made on Wa-Wisa villages on the banks of the rivers; the raiders, waiting till the men of the village were out, would approach in their canoes and catch all the women they could. As the rule of Europeans, with European law, gets a firmer hold, this marriage by capture will presumably give way entirely to the common method of marriage by barter. The local value of a woman is one sheep (market value about 75 cents). In the case of a 'nafumo,' who was killed, compensation was fixed at one canoe, one sheep and a string of beads."

SHUNKS LATEST REPORT.

It is not at all surprising that the Chief of Engineers at Washington gave Conl. Shnuk orders to go over the ground personaly and hold public meetings at Grand Forks, Crookston, and Thief River Falls, about the log jams in Red Lake River, when his last report under date of December 16th, was received by the Chief Engineer at Washington and sized up by lawyers like the Hon. Steenerson, Clapp, and Nelson.

The report is to long for our space, to publish it in full, but he says:

"3, Complaint simular to the within was made on July 26th,. It was investigated by Mr. Patrick F. Jolce, junior engineer, and report (to which I would respectfully refer) was submitted by me on August 15th,. The essential part of Mr. Joyce's report is as follows:- (I was referred)" to a delegation of Thief River Falls officials, who, during July, this year, made an examination of the river between Thief River Falls and its sourse, the outlet of Red Lake, a distance of 95 miles. The delegation was composed of Dr. G. W. Booren, Milton Forder, and J. C. Berg. The object was to locate the cause of the low water conditions in the river."

A little further on in the same report Conl. Shnuk says:

"I should like to make an examination of the locality, but it is not practicable. There are no roads and no place to stay. The only avenue is the river. which is closed, so that it would be necessary to organize an expedition with horses and provisions Nothing would warrant the expenditure. The interests of navigation and commerce are not concerned, and cannot be before next summer."

Then the Col. closes his argument with that good old tune: "I therefore recommend that no action be taken."

We would like to ask the Col. one question: If there was no way to get to that outlet, only by way of the river, and that was closed, how did your Thief River Falls officials get up there? We never heard of but one flying machine being in Thief River Falls, and that wouldn't fly, so how did they get up to the outlet of Red Lake?

As we are fully informed on these matters we will tell you. They drove up in a two seated buggy, and, your engineer could have done the same, if he had visited a livery barn, instead of a lumber company's office, at Thief River Falls.

Now my dear Conl. Are you of the opinion that the people of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota are such suckers as to elect a man to congress term, after term, that could not size up a report like your last one? If you were, you have since found out your mistake, for you got orders to "take action," and investigate that log jam in Red Lake River.

This is no new fight between the settlers living along this river and the lumber company's, backed up by that St. Paul branch of government engineers, but has been brewing for years, until it has got down to a point where the settlers have got to fight, or move out, and they have decided to imitate the example of their brother's over, in Clearwater County, and fight it out.

The Republican party of this state will make a mistake, if they nominate either Eberhart or Gordon. what the party want is an up-to-date progressive republican, that has not been to prominent in the county option fight.

What is the matter with the Clearbrook Journal? It seems to us that Bro Anderson had ought to have another candidate in view by this time.

An Odd Incident of War.

In the Philippine portion of his book "The Memories of Two Wars" General Funston tells of a unique instance at the siege of Molobon: "Company L was firing a few volleys, and one of the men, having just discharged his piece, felt a second blow against his shoulder, it being almost as hard as the kick of the gun. Upon trying to reload it was found that the breech of the piece could not be opened, and it was laid aside to be examined by daylight, which was done in the presence of a number of us officers. Upon forcing the breech open it was found that the base of the copper shell of the cartridge that had been fired just before the weapon had been disabled had been shot away, while mixed all up in the breech mechanism we found the remains of the steel jacket and the lead filling of a Mauser bullet. There was a very pronounced dent on the muzzle of the piece. What had happened was that while the man had the gun extended in the firing position a bullet had gone down the muzzle. This weapon is now in the Army Ordnance museum in Washington."

The Wettins of England.

If the king of England were to renounce the throne and resolve to become an ordinary citizen he would be called George Wettin. How does the name Wettin come to be the king's surname? This is the answer:

Queen Victoria married Albert, duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, of the senior branch of the house of Saxony. The family name by which this house, during from the middle of the tenth century, came to be known afterword was Wettin, and this was and is the surname of both branches—the Ernestine and Albertine—of the house of Saxony. The name comes from the castle of Wettin, near Magdeburg, which claimed Wittekind as the founder of the race.—London Answers.

Preaching and Practice.

The college instructor should take pains to practice what he preaches.

One member of a class in English composition brought his theme to the professor after recitation hour in order that the professor might read a marginal correction which he had written and which the pupil had been entirely unable to make out.

"Why," explained the professor, "that says, 'Write more plainly!'"—Youth's Companion.

SHUNKS LATEST REPORT.

It is not at all surprising that the Chief of Engineers et Washington gave Conl.Shnnk orders to go over the ground personely and hold public meetings at Grand Forks, Crookston, end Thief River Falls, ebout the log jams in Red Lake River, when his last report under date of December 16th, was received by the Chief Engineer et Washington and sized up by lewyers like the Hon.Steenerson, Clapp, end Nelson.

The report is to iong for our space, to publish it in full, but he says:

"3, Complaint simuler to the within was made on July 26th.. It was investigated by Mr. Patrick F. Joice, junior engineer, end report (to which I would respectfully refer) was submitted by me on August 15th,. The essential part of Mr.Joyce's report is as follows:- (I was referred)" to a delegation of Thief River Falls officiels, who, during July, this year, made an exemination of the river between Thief River Falls and its sourse, the outlet of Red Lake, a distance of 95 miles. The delegation was composed of Dr. G.W.Booren, Milton Forder, and J.C.Berg. The object was to locate the cause of the low water conditions in the river."

A little further on in the same report Conl. Shunk says:

"I should like to make an examination of the locality, but it is not practicable. There are no roeds and no place to stay. The only avenue is the river. which is closed, so thet it would be neceassery to organize an expedition with horses and provisions Nothing would warrant the expenditure. The interests of navigetion and commerce are not concerned, and cannot be before next summer."

Then the Col. closes his argument with that good old tune: "I therefore recommend thet no action be taken."

We would like to ask the Col. one question: If there was no way to get to that outlet, only by way of the river, and that was closed, how did your Thief River Falls officials get up there? We never heard of but one flying machine being in Thief River Falls, and that wouldent fly, so how did they get up to the outlet of Red Leke?

As we are fully informed on these matters we will tell you. They drove up in e two seeted buggy, and, your engineer could have done the same, if he had visited a livery barn, instead of a lumber company's office, at Thief River Falls.

Now my dear Conl. Are you of the opinion that the people of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota are such suckers as to elect a man to congress term, after term, that could not size up a report like your last one? If you were, you have since found out your mistake, for you got orders to "take action," and investigate that log jam in Red Lake River.

This is no new fight between the settlers living along this river and the lumber company's, backed up by that St.Paul branch of government engineers, but has been brewing for years, until it has got down to a point where the settlers have got to fight, or move out, and they have decided to imitate the example of their brother's over in Clearwater County, and fight it out.

The Republican party of this state will make a mistake, if they nominate either Eberhart or Gordon. whet the party want is an up-to date progressive republican, that has not been to prominent in the county option fight.

Whet is the matter with the Clearbrook Journel? It seems to us that Bro Anderson had ought to have enother candidete in view by this time.

An Odd Incident of War.

In the Philippine portion of his book "The Memories of Two Wars" General Funston tells of a unique instance at the siege of Malabon: "Company L was firing a few volleys, and one of the men, having just discharged his piece, felt a second blow against his shoulder, it being almost as hard as the kick of the gun. Upon trying to reload it was found that the breech of the piece could not be opened, and it was laid aside to be examined by daylight, which was done in the presence of a number of us officers. Upon forcing the breech open it was found that the base of the copper shell of the cartridge that had been fired just before the weapon had been disabled had been shot away, while mixed all up in the breech mechanism we found the remains of the steel jacket and the lead filling of a Mauser bullet. There was a very pronounced dent on the muzzle of the piece. What had happened was that while the man had the gun extended in the firing position a bullet had gone down the muzzle. This weapon is now in the Army Ordnance museum in Washington."

The Wettins of England.

If the king of England were to renounce the throne and resolve to become an ordinary citizen he would be called George Wettin. How does the name Wettin come to be the king's surname? This is the answer:

Queen Victoria married Albert, duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, of the senior branch of the house of Saxony. The family name by which this house, dating from the middle of the tenth century, came to be known afterward was Wettin, and this was and is the surname of both branches—the Ernestine and Albertine—of the house of Saxony. The name comes from the castle of Wettin, near Magdeburg, which claimed Wittekind as the founder of the race.—London Answers.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

The jaming of the Red Lake River with logs is to be discussed at Thief River Falls on January 16th, at Crookston on January 17th, and at Grand Forks January 17th,. Major Col' Sbunk will be present at these meetings and any one aquainted with the facts about the log jams in Red Lake River will be given an oprotunity to be heard.

In a news item the Crookston Daily Times says:

"Others claim that the logs have nothing to do with the low water experienced at Grand Forks now, but that a retaining dam is necessary at Red Lake in order to keep the water in the river somewhare near normal by not allowing the flood waters in the spring but to store them and keep a uniform flow the year around practicticaily.''

It is evident that the above wise information came from a log jamer. Now we want to ask the gentelman a question, viz: If the present low stage of water is not caused by a log jam, what in the devil do you want of a dam to hold back the flood waters of Red Lake in the spring for?

Con'.Sbunk, in his last report gives the discharge from Red Lake in July as 68½ feet per second, and in November 17 feet per second.

George Ralph, state drainage engineer says: "We have elevations taken on this lake in the year 1905 which show the lake to have an elevation of 1178 feet above the sea. Its present elevation is about 1175 feet and I think it was as low as 1174 at one time last summer." * * "It also shows that there is a fall of some 4 or 5 feet from the surface of the lake at the present time down to the back waters of the log jam."

Compare these figures you good people of Thief River Falls, then take a glance at the bonds on your homes to get power to run your city water works, while your natural water power was held back by this log jam. Read them you people of Grand Forks and Crookston, and say how you like it. Facts and figures do not lie,and they show that there would now,be about 4 or 5 feet of water in this river, if it was was not shut off by this log jam. But we will get it in the spring! Remember that the above figures are taken from the engineers reports and we have the originals on file in this office. Yesterday an "expedition" left Sunbeam to visit the outlet of Red Lake and report the conditions as they are. They are not fitted out with "horses and provisions", but you can bet they will "get there, just the same."Then the people will hear some more news.

Their Christmas Guest

by Clarissa Mackie

(Copyright.)

THE red farmhouse was set in the midst of a white expanse of snow. The drooping elms protected the roof with widespread arms clothed in ermine and where the crisp wind had blown away the covering the limbs were darkly sketched against the bright blue sky. A thin spiral of smoke drifted up from the big chimney and shimmered away into nothingness.

Loring tramped wearily up the path and turned the corner by the clump of boxwood where a little side porch jutted out to the south. There was a window here filled with red geraniums and the brilliant color seemed to impart warmth to his benumbed body. The steps had been swept clear of snow and he was careful to scrape his boots before he knocked at the door.

The whirring of a sewing machine stopped suddenly and quick steps came across the floor. The door flew open and revealed two faces; that of Miss Anne, timidly expectant, and the fair face of the young girl, hopeful and eager.

"Oh!" they cried in unison and their voices betrayed bitter disappointment. "We thought it might be the expressman," added Anne in explanation.

"I'm sorry to disappoint you," said Loring courteously as he bared his head. "As a matter of fact, I came to beg a night's lodging. I have rather a bad knee and it's gone back on me in the midst of a long tramp. I wonder—"

"Come in," interrupted Anne hospitably. "It's bitter cold out to-day and the drifts are awful. We haven't as many fires as we used to keep, but you're welcome to sit and get thawed out."

Robert Loring entered the low-ceiled sitting-room where a small cylinder stove gave forth welcome heat in the center of the room. The corners seemed chill and dusky, but in the circle of warmth from the stove it was very comfortable. A sewing machine was drawn within the magic circle and there was a low rocking chair and beside it a huge work basket overflowing with bright bits of silk.

Anne pushed a big rocking chair close to the stove and motioned Loring into it. "Sit close to the fire and get thawed out. Grace will fetch you a glass of currant wine—or maybe you'd rather have a cup of coffee?" She beamed hospitably at him over steel-bowed spectacles that were the color of her silvery hair.

"I would say 'coffee' if it were not so much trouble," hesitated Loring. "It does seem an imposition for me to drop in on you in this manner, but as I was explaining—"

"It will be no trouble at all. Grace will be glad to make you a cup of coffee."

The fair-haired girl hastened to a tiny cupboard and brought out a small canister and a coffee pot. Miss Anne, excusing herself for a moment, rose and left the room. Loring watching the young girl's graceful movements was suddenly impressed by a painful fact. His hostesses were unmistakably poor. The girl had shaken the last grains of coffee into the pot and filling it with cold water placed it on the top of the cylinder stove. Then she stepped to and fro from cupboard to table, laying a meal on a snowy cloth. There were fresh bread and butter, baked apples and some slices of cold ham.

When she had invited him to sit down, Loring arose with many apologies upon his lips. Just then the door opened to admit Miss Anne muffled in shawl and hood and trembling with agitation. She seemed to forget Loring's presence and her words were addressed to her niece.

"Grace—what do you think has happened? That—that—he's gone!" Her thin hands flew to her face and the tears trickled between her fingers.

"Oh, Aunt Anne!" The girl threw her arm around the older woman's shoulder. "Are you sure? Why he was there not a half hour ago because I looked at him. How do you suppose he got away?"

"I guess somebody has taken him—he was so fat, too, Grace." Miss Anne sank down in a chair and slowly removed her wraps. "Oh, dear, I'm afraid your coffee will get cold. Sit down and eat your supper, sir."

"Thank you," said Loring, as he obeyed. "I hope you are not in trouble, Miss Anne? Is there anything that I can do to make things right?"

Miss Anne surveyed him with approving eyes. All at once her eyes wrinkled pleasantly and she began to laugh. "Do you think you can discover who stole the white rooster we were going to have for our Christmas dinner? I had him penned up safely and I just went out now to have a look at him and he is gone—the hen house is empty."

"That is too bad. Can't I catch another one for you or was the white rooster especially fattened for the occasion?" asked Loring.

Miss Anne hesitated and looked at her niece. But the girl busied with her bright silks did not lift her eyes; a faint color glowed in her cheeks.

"There isn't another chicken about the place," said Miss Anne bluntly. "I may as well say, sir, that it was the last of my flock; that's why it is a disappointment to me."

Loring arose from his chair and reached for his overcoat. "Then it's my place to scour the country-side for one to take its place," he said firmly. "Please don't tell me not to—it's Christmas eve, you know, and there isn't a soul that expects me to do anything and I'd like to feel I was of some use at such a time. I won't return without a bird of some sort if I have to rob a roost myself."

Without waiting to hear their protests, Loring let himself out into the starlit night and plunged into the crisp snow.

Two hours afterward when he returned heavily laden, the windows of the farmhouse glowed pleasantly and seemed to offer a welcome. As he stamped the snow from his feet at the side door he heard Miss Anne's voice raised in warm approval.

"Well, now, Grace, I believe the poor fellow will be tickled to death to get that pin book; he said the didn't have any folks—he seems honest enough—"

Loring stumbled into the warm room and let his packages down on to the round table. He held his cold fingers to the heat. "I didn't find the white rooster, but I did corral the plumpest little white goose you ever saw; it's such a long time since I've prepared for Christmas that once started I couldn't stop, so I went on through the village and bought all the rest of the fixings—I hope you won't object—oh, well, Miss Anne—I shall just take my packages and have Christmas by myself in the woods." Miss Anne's sensitive pride had prompted her to wave aside the proffered edibles, but as Loring replaced the packages in the basket she watched him all unconscious of the fact that her eyes were wistful. First went the plump goose and following it were turnips and potatoes, cranberries and onions and celery; a bag of white grapes; another of nuts and a large and tempting box of candy.

With his basket on his arm, Loring turned to the door. "I must thank you for your kindness," he said gravely.

"There Isn't Another Chicken About the Place."

"You have taken me in and permitted me to rest when I was cold and tired; and you have offered me the sweetest hospitality. I wish you and Miss Grace the most joyful Christmas you have ever known."

His hand was on the knob when Miss Anne stopped him. "I don't like to have you go like that, sir. You are welcome to remain until you can resume your journey and to our fare plain as it is—the Leightons have always prided themselves on their hospitality, but of late years—"

"Leighton!" interrupted Loring, placing his basket on the floor and opening his overcoat. "Are you Miss Anne Leighton?"

Miss Anne's round eyes opened wide. "Yes—why do you ask?"

Loring took a letter case from an inner pocket and searched carefully in its depths. "You are a cousin to Mr. Josiah Leighton, of Boston? Yes? Very well, my search is ended then. I am Mr. Leighton's private secretary, Robert Loring, and he sent me to seek you out and present this letter. I believe it contains a Christmas gift as well as an offer to make your future home with him. By Jove, but it's the merest chance that led me here. I reached the station all right and hired a man to drive me to your place. He lost his way and we traveled half a day; then he managed to upset me into a snow bank and he made off, leaving me to find my way back to civilization as best I could. You see fate led me here." He was looking at Grace's downcast face rather than at Miss Anne's excitedly bobbing figure.

"Grace Leighton—here we were watching for the expressman, thinking Cousin Josiah was going to send his usual presents of silk waists—and here is his letter and a check for $50. You wished us a joyful Christmas, Mr. Loring; I guess it's going to be one!"

"I have a feeling," said Loring, deliberately, "that it is the beginning of many happy Christmases for me."

He was still thoughtfully regarding the sweet profile of the young girl bending over her bright silks.

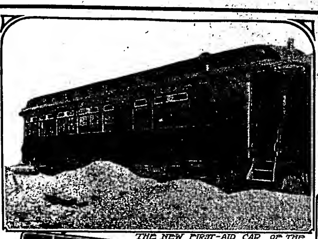
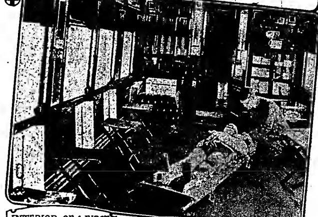
The New First-Aid Car

THE American Red Cross, that great humanitarian organization for relieving suffering and distress in time of peace as well as in time of war, is constantly broadening the scope of its activities. Its latest, and certainly one of its most important services on behalf of mankind is the placing in commission of a second hospital and school on wheels known as a first aid to the injured car. The object of this ingenious portable Red Cross headquarters is to interest and instruct in first aid work the railroad man and other toilers of the country. By means of this car the Red Cross will be enabled to carry on a much-needed form of "missionary work" and can get in close touch, as it could by no other method, with the workingmen of the land who are in a position to render the most valuable service as volunteer Red Cross workers.



THE NEW FIRST-AID CAR OF THE AMERICAN RED CROSS

The first aid car which has lately gone into commission is the second of these cars to be sent a wandering up and down the steel-tracked highways of the United States, but the first one, which was introduced less than a year ago, went forth with so modest a heralding that the general public heard little of it or its work. No sooner, however, had Car No. 1 entered upon the work of giving instruction in first aid to employes of various railroad systems than it became evident that a single car would be insufficient to meet the demands for this new service. Accordingly a second car was arranged for—an old parlor car being purchased by the Red Cross and rebuilt for this specific purpose. Henceforth the Red Cross officials will be enabled to realize their dream to keep one of the cars constantly in service on the railroads west of the Mississippi and the other on the railway systems east of the Mississippi.



INTERIOR OF A FIRST AID CAR - DURING A DEMONSTRATION

The Red Cross first aid instruction cars are rather small cars judged by present day standards, but this was designedly so and is an advantage rather than a detriment. Indeed, with a length of less than sixty feet such a car may be used not only on the mountain divisions of railways, with their sharp curves, but also on some trolley lines. Indeed, the car can be taken almost anywhere where there are rails over which it may run. Incidentally it may be mentioned that the railroads of the country are manifesting their appreciation of the valuable and disinterested work which the Red Cross is doing in this sphere by hauling the first aid cars free of charge over their respective lines.

RENDERING FIRST-AID TO AN INJURED RAILROAD MAN

MAKING USE OF A FIRST-AID CABINET OF REMEDIES

The first aid car is divided into two parts of almost equal size. One-half of the space of the car is given over to an assembly and demonstration room—for, as has been explained, the car is a hospital school on wheels—and the other half is taken up by the living quarters for the instructors and crew. These men live on the car at all times, just as doctors and nurses might reside at a hospital with which they were connected. It is in the assembly and demonstration room, however, that the chief functions of the car are carried on. The room is large enough to accommodate a considerable number of people, seated on camp stools, so that it is entirely practicable to use it as a lecture hall in giving first aid instruction when there is no larger hall available in a town visited and when weather conditions do not permit of the first aid demonstrations being conducted in the open air.

But the first aid car has another function quite aside from its primary purpose of a nomadic school. It may, on occasion, be used as a temporary or emergency hospital and it is likely to prove of great value in this capacity, since it can, upon telegraphic request, be rushed to any camp or town or village where a disaster of any kind has taken place and where there are, mayhap, no regular hospital facilities of any kind. The car carries the necessary apparatus for quickly transforming the lecture room into a hospital ward and there is a stock of stretchers, remedies, bandages and all the paraphernalia necessary for use under such circumstances. This latter equipment is in addition, of course, to the appointments and instruction outfits, charts, books, etc., which are designed merely for use in the regular instruction work on the car and which later will probably be the equipment used nine-tenths of the time, for summons to lend aid in great disasters will, happily, it is hoped, be of rare occurrence.

Few people appreciate the great need for more general instruction in first aid work such as the Red Cross is going to try to give through the instrumentality of its new rolling stock. We have become pretty well aroused in this country in recent years over the menace of the "white plague," and yet as a matter of fact, since 1881 the deaths from tuberculosis in the United States have decreased 48 per cent, whereas in the same period the deaths from accidents have increased more than 47 per cent. Similarly the United States government has felt compelled within the past couple of years to take definite steps to reduce the number of accidents in our coal mines and yet the death rate from accidents on railways is even larger than in mines. Moreover, under present arrangements the needs of the miner in respect to first aid instruction seem to be met much better than in the case of some other industries. No wonder, then, that the Red Cross is directing its first aid propaganda to the railroad men of the country and to the workers in shops, mills, etc.

Not only is the Red Cross giving widespread instruction in first aid to the injured (which it is argued is just as necessary as instruction in hygiene) but it is conducting, by means of this new type of car, a campaign for the prevention of accidents. Statistics seem to indicate that about one-half of the accidents which result in injury or death would have been preventable by the exercise of proper care and reasonable preventive measures and the Red Cross is endeavoring to teach workmen how to dodge mishaps and how to minimize the effect of an accident if it does appear inevitable.

The Red Cross will not depend entirely upon the lessons and lectures given on the first aid cars, although these pave the way for effort in the direction of volunteer first aid work. Supplementing these are series of charts and, more important yet, simple books of instruction and surgical materials which can prove serviceable in unskilled hands. A special first aid book has been issued for the use of industrial workers and has been translated into Italian, Slovak, Polish and Lithuanian. In the near future there will be issued other editions of this work specially adapted for use by women, by policemen and firemen, by sailors and by farm hands and ranch workers. Of course it is not the thought that such instruction will enable even the most skilled of the volunteer Red Cross workers to replace the doctor except in the case of trivial injuries, but with the new knowledge these volunteers will know what to do until the doctor arrives, and often, by stopping a flow of blood or by other means, may be enabled to save life when a regular physician is not promptly on the scene.

To cover the full scope of this new work the Red Cross has found it necessary to go even farther and to supplement its work of instruction by providing several different forms of first aid boxes equipped with certain simple remedies and necessities such as are required in putting the first aid instruction into practice in shops and elsewhere. These supplies are sold at prices which are intended merely to cover the cost of preparation without providing any profit, and that they supply a long felt want would seem to be indicated by the fact that the Red Cross has during the past year, sold considerably more than $5,000 worth of such supplies. And, not content with carrying this first aid crusade into the shops and mills and throughout the railroad world, the Red Cross has lately enlisted the co-operation of the Boy Scouts of America, and first aid instruction is being given to all of the youngsters in this organization according to plans and methods prepared by the Red Cross.

BANDAGING THE HEAD OF A FELLOW WORKMAN

Such are the demands upon it that a first aid car cannot remain for long at any given point. The general plan adopted is to spend about three days at each point selected by the railway officials—that is, the officers of the railroad system whose lines are being traversed. As many first aid demonstrations and lectures as possible are given in the time allotted. As a rule it is not practicable thoroughly to instruct men in first aid work in so short a time, but they learn considerable of the subject and there is an arousal of interest which almost invariably results in the organization of a first aid corps which is developed by local physicians and with the aid of the Red Cross instruction books and emergency outfits. Still further to stimulate interest throughout the country the Red Cross has set aside a fund of $5,000 the income of which is to be distributed annually in prizes to the first aid workers who show the greatest proficiency or who perform exceptionally dangerous or arduous first aid work.

The past few years has seen remarkable progress in the proficiency attained by workmen in caring for their fellows who have suffered injuries in the line of their work. From the rough and ready surgery in which the workman has always displayed some skill in treating the injuries peculiar to his own special vocation, modern antiseptic methods have been acquired and now the unfortunate victim of an accident is given all the chances in his fight for life that modern science can devise. There is no longer idle hands and anxious moments awaiting the arrival of the surgeon, and rough but skillful hands perform the first aid treatment which gives relief to the sufferer, and in many cases means the saving of his life. All large manufacturing establishments are now equipped with first-aid chests supplied with all the necessary surgical and medical appliances for giving emergency treatment. Regular drills in ambulance work are conducted so that those whose duty it is to care for the injured workmen may be kept at the highest state of proficiency. Humanitarian as well as financial reasons make it the part of wisdom for the employers to encourage in every way the first aid crusade among their workmen. One case is related of a workman in a Chicago factory who removed a steel splinter from the eye of a fellow workman in such a skillful manner as to excite the wonder and admiration of the surgeons who later took charge of the injured man. The promptness and skill of this emergency surgeon saved the sight of this man's eyes.

PIPE OR CIGARETTE.

Latter Apparently the Form in Which Tobacco Was First Used.

While the question as to which preceded the other, the egg or the hen, is still a subject for dispute in the district school debating societies, the question as to which came first into use, the pipe or the cigarette, appears to have the greater part of the evidence, so far as white testimony is concerned, in favor of the cigarette—and anti-tobacconists may put that in their pipe and smoke it, the Indianapolis News remarks. When Columbus landed on the island of Gunnahani, which he called San Salvador, on October 12, 1492, he and his men saw, to their great astonishment, a number of copper colored natives collected on the shore puffing clouds of smoke from their lips and noses. They were smoking what later came to be called tobacco, the leaves of which the natives had formed into cylindrical rolls within the husks of the Indian corn. While this was evidently the most primitive way of burning the leaf, there were pipes long before Columbus arrived. Large numbers of pipes have been found in so-called Indian mounds in the central west, as well as along the northern lakes and throughout the south. In 1519, when Cortez invaded Mexico, the natives smoked pipes made from reeds and richly ornamented. Montezuma, it has been recorded, was accustomed to take his pipe after dinner when it was brought to him with much ceremony by a bevy of beautiful maidens and handed to him after he had rinsed his mouth with scented water.

The North American Indian usually made his pipes out of a kind of stone known as red pipestone, of which there were large deposits in the old Sioux country and the great spirit is said to have given his indorsement to this particular material, which might have been a Sioux monopoly, in these words:

"This stone is red. It is your flesh. It belongs to you in all. Out of it make no more tomahawks, war hatchets nor scalping knives, use it only to make the pipe of peace and smoke therefrom when you would propitiate me and do my will."

CHANGED PLANS.

A Chicago banker was dictating a letter to his stenographer.

"Tell Mr. So-and-so," he ordered, "that I will meet him in Schenectady."

"How do you spell Schenectady?" asked the stenographer.

"S-c, Sc-er-er—er. Tell him I'll meet him in Albany."

POULTRY

AUTOMATIC HEN TRAP NEST

Enables Owner to Tell Which Chicken Has Laid Egg—Made Vermin Proof and Safe From Rats.

Who says poultry raising is not a science? A Pennsylvania man has just come forward with an automatic trap nest, by means of which the farmer can tell which hen laid which egg. As the hen enters the nest her weight on the floor causes the door to close. When she lays an egg it rolls down upon another spring-operated mechanism and opens the exit door. The runway into which this exit leads has a series of small stalls.

Trap Nest for Hens.

As she passes through each the door closes behind her, and she cannot go back. The next hen goes through the same performance, and her egg rolls into position just back of that laid by No. 1. It is easy, therefore, to match chickens with eggs and find what kind of food gives the best results. The trap nest is made vermin proof and the eggs in it are safe from the voracity of rats or other animals, or even the chickens themselves.

IOWA WINTER FEED METHOD

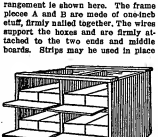
With Range of Rye, Daily Feed of Cabbage and Warm Mash Hens Should Be in Fine Condition.

An Iowa poultryman advises this method for keeping cabbage as a winter feed for fowls: As soon as severe freezing threatens, the cabbage should be pulled up and stored away. We adopt the simple method of burying them in the ground, usually right where they stood. The finest heads are reserved for the table and put to themselves and all the remainder of every degree buried down for the poultry. Covering them is quickly done by throwing out a trench with the plow that will admit three heads side by side; then another layer of two heads wide is placed on top of these with roots turned up in every case. Some straw or grass is then thrown over them and on top of this is a thin layer of earth, of a slope to shed off the rain. Later on a heavier covering of earth may be added. Cabbage thus treated will continue to grow more tender, crisp and sweet and far excels in flavor the dry stored kind. With a range of green rye, a daily feed of cabbage and a warm mash in cold weather mixed with cooked turnips, beets or potatoes, the hens should be in prime condition to make a high egg record.

NEST BOXES MADE MOVABLE

Arrangement Is Shown Where Devices Are Desired to Be Removed From One Place to Another.

It is frequently desirable to have nest boxes which are readily removable from each other. Such an arrangement is shown here. The frame pieces A and B are made of one-inch stuff, firmly nailed together. The wires support the boxes and are firmly attached to the two ends and middle boards. Strips may be used in place of the wires if necessary. The nest boxes are made of half-inch lumber and are 11 inches wide, 12 inches long and 5 inches deep. The bottom is made to project six inches, leaving a step for the hens to light on. A space of 12 inches should be left between the wires so as to give sufficient room for the hens.



Movable Nest Boxes.

To Make Dropping Boards.

Dropping boards should be made of matched lumber, and should be 20 inches wide for one roost, and three feet for two. It should be placed from 10 to 12 inches from the wall. The roosts should be 2 by 2 inches, with edges slightly rounded.

A HEALTHY, HAPPY OLD AGE

May be promoted by those who gently cleanse the system, now and then, when in need of a laxative remedy, by taking a dessertspoonful of the ever refreshing, wholesome and truly beneficial Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna, which is the only family laxative generally approved by the most eminent physicians, because it acts in a natural, strengthening way and warms and tones up the internal organs without weakening them. It is equally beneficial for the very young and the middle aged, as it is always efficient and free from all harmful ingredients. To get its beneficial effects it is always necessary to buy the genuine, bearing the name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—plainly printed on the front of every package.

Jones Admitted It.

Jones and Brown argued as they always did when they had time enough. They had dined together, and as Jones lived at a distance and it was very late Brown offered to put him up for the night.

On the way home they fell to discussing the strategy of the Civil war as indicated by the campaigns of Lee and Grant. The topic was elastic enough to keep them going for half an hour and reached its height as they neared the Brown house

Then Brown lost his temper. "Jones," said he, "if you don't admit that Grant was a greater general than Lee, you can't sleep here."

It was then two o'clock in the morning, and Jones was eight miles from home.—Chicago Post.

Feminine Rebuke.

The suffragette was conversing with the eminent African traveler.

"And you don't believe in woman suffrage?" said the lady.

"No, madam," the hunter of big game replied, "I believe that the feminine traits, gentle, humane, tender, fit your sex for the home rather than for the sterner duties of life, or the possible necessities of the state."

"Yes," the suffragette replied. "I have heard those arguments before. And now may I ask how you received that deep scar on your cheek?"

"It was given me by a lioness, madam."

The suffragette smiled.

"Good for the lady lion," she said.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

TIED DOWN.

20 Years' Slavery—How She Got Freedom.

A dyspeptic veteran who writes from one of England's charming rural homes to tell how she won victory in her 20 years' fight, naturally exults in her triumph over the tea and coffee habit:

"I feel it a duty to tell you," she says, "how much good Postum has done me. I am grateful, but also desire to let others who may be suffering as I did, know of the delightful method by which I was relieved.

"I had suffered for 20 years from dyspepsia, and the giddiness that usually accompanies that painful ailment, and which frequently prostrated me. I never drank much coffee, and cocoa and even milk did not agree with my impaired digestion, so I used tea, exclusively, till about a year ago, when I found in a package of Grape-Nuts the little book, 'The Road to Wellville.'

"After a careful reading of the booklet I was curious to try Postum and sent for a package. I enjoyed it from the first, and at once gave up tea in its favor.

"I began to feel better very soon. My giddiness left me after the first few days' use of Postum, and my stomach became stronger so rapidly that it was not long till I was able (as I still am) to take milk and many other articles of food of which I was formerly compelled to deny myself. I have proved the truth of your statement that Postum 'makes good, red blood.'

"I have become very enthusiastic over the merits of my new table beverage, and during the past few months, have conducted a Postum propaganda among my neighbors which has brought benefit to many, and I shall continue to tell my friends of the 'better way' in which I rejoice." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

BUTTER GOES EAST

FIVE THOUSAND POUNDS FROM ALBERT LEA EXHIBIT GOES AT 35½ CENT RATE.

ALL ARE PRIZE WINNING TUBS

Remainder Purchased by State Officers at 36c.—Dairy and Food Department Admits Best Is Shipped.

St. Paul.—The assertion that Minnesota's best butter goes East to satisfy the palates of the exacting and that consumers in the Twin Cities must content themselves with the lower grades, is borne out by the admission of the state dairy and food department that the exhibit in the last state butter contest over which it had supervision went to a Philadelphia concern.

At this contest, in which 5,000 pounds of butter were entered, the best makes in the state were shown and it was sold to P. F. Brown & Co., of Philadelphia at a straight price of 35½ cents a pound. The contest was known as the sixth in the series of state educational butter tests and was held in connection with the annual meeting of the Butter and Cheesemakers' association in Albert Lea. Some of this butter scored as high as 96½.

An Atlantic City concern was a rival to the Philadelphia company for the butter entered. All that Minnesota consumers received of the high grade entries was several tubs which went to those who cared to pay 36 cents a pound for it. Employes of the dairy and food department and others about the state capitol were the purchasers.

State Fair Butter Purchased.

Another evidence of the East gobbling up Minnesota's best butter was shown at the recent state fair when the Atlantic & Pacific Co. took over at the market price all of the butter and cheese exhibited in the dairy building.

Secretary McIntosh of the dairy and food department was asked yesterday why the commission did not make an effort to keep this butter within the state and thus benefit consumers who were compelled to pay 40 to 42 cents for supposed best grades. He said the butter entered in the contest was not the state's property and that all the department did was to find a market for it and secure the best prices obtainable for the owner.

"In the contests heretofore held," said Secretary McIntosh, "the butter entered was disposed of to the Twin City retailers. The bids of the wholesalers have never been considered. The Easterners like our butter and that is why they are so eager to get hold of it. At one contest most of the butter was bought by the state board of control for use in the state institutions, but the board was not a bidder last time. It has always been the custom to allow employes of the department and others who want a tub to have it at market price plus any extra expense in bringing it to the state capitol."

STREET CAR CASE UPHELD.

"Straphanger" Conviction of Conductor Sustained by the Supreme Court.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Chris Overby, streetcar conductor, according to a decision from the state supreme court, is guilty of violating the Minneapolis "straphanger" ordinance prohibiting the street railway company from admitting passengers to its cars in excess of one and one-half times its seating capacity.

Overby was convicted upon the testimony of two Minneapolis detectives, who boarded an interurban car and took him and his motorman off the car.

An appeal was taken to the supreme court, the main point being that the detectives were not passengers. The supreme court sustains the municipal court. The validity of the ordinance was not an issue in this appeal.

PIONEER LUMBERMAN DEAD.

Caleb S. Philbrick of Minneapolis Dies Suddenly.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Caleb S. Philbrick, 74 years old, a pioneer resident of Minneapolis, died suddenly at his home, 814 University avenue S. E. Mr. Philbrick came to Minneapolis in 1854 and engaged in the lumber business from which he retired ten years ago. He is survived by his wife, who was Miss Lois A. Day, youngest daughter of Leonard Day. Mr. Philbrick was born in Maine. Funeral services took place Wednesday at 2 p. m. at the Lakewood cemetary chapel, conducted by Cataract lodge No. 2, A. F. & A. M., with the members of the Darius Commandry No. 7, Knights Templar, as an escort.

WINONA STRIKE CONTINUES.

Motormen Establish an Omnibus System.

Winona. — No progress has yet been made towards a settlement of the street railway motormen's strike. There was talk of putting the whole matter up to the federal court. The striking motormen have established an extensive bus service which was well patronized. The street car service still is badly crippled.

DR. MAYO WILL RECOVER.

Is Opinion of Surgeons After Second Operation.

New York, N. Y.—Dr. Charles H. Mayo of Rochester, Minn., world famous surgeon, was operated on for the second time in a week in the Presbyterian hospital here. He had been operated on for acute appendicitis on Saturday, Dec. 16. The second operation was for acute cholecystitis (inflammation of the gall bladder) with gall stones.

While Dr. Charles Mayo was rallying from the effects of this second operation, his brother, Dr. William J. Mayo, associated with him in conducting the famous hospital in Rochester, was hastening from Minnesota to his bedside. Dr. Will Mayo rode in a locomotive cab from Rochester to Winona, hurried by special train from Winona to Chicago and rode in a Pennsylvania 18-hour flyer from Chicago to New York.

The condition of Dr. Mayo indicates that he will recover.

CUYUNA ROAD READY SOON.

Brainerd to Be Connected With Iron Range by New Year's Day.

Brainerd.—The New Year is expected to see the completion of the Cuyuna Northern railroad connecting Brainerd with the Cuyuna iron range, as steel is already laid to within less than a mile of the mine workings. The Soo already is on the ground.

The construction of the Cuyuna Northern, its completion and early operation is expected to have a great deal to do with the future of the most recently discovered ore beds on the iron range map of northern Minnesota. It is anticipated that the operation of the new road will commence shortly after the first of the year, but it is probable that the regular service will not go into effect until spring.

The territory between the present terminus of the road and Barrows has been drilled and prospected at many places and the indications are that it is very rich in ore, and that many mines shortly will be in operation.

ANXIOUS TO PLEAD GUILTY.

Johnson of Lakefield Will Not Fight Charge of Murder.

Jackson.—District court will convene in this city on the second Tuesday in January, and the grand jury will take up the case of Martin Johnson, who shot and killed his friend and benefactor, Ole Sandagar, at Lakefield. Since he was placed in jail here Johnson has maintained a sullen silence. He will converse with no one and seems anxious to go before Judge Quinn and plead guilty and receive his sentence. He says he does not want an attorney.

"Let George Do It" at Minneapolis.

Minneapolis.—"Let George Do It," a big musical concoction founded on Geo. McManus' famous drawings, is coming to the Bijou, Minneapolis, for New Year's week, with George P. Murphy in the stellar role. The chorus is of the liveliest sort and there is something doing every minute.

Mart Adson Resigns Position.

Duluth.—Mart Adson, general passenger agent of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic road, has tendered his resignation to take effect Dec. 31. His plans for the future are not announced, but they will take him away from Duluth. Mr. Adson succeeded George Hibbard as general passenger agent of the South Shore six and one-half years ago. He advanced from the position of stenographer in the Duluth ticket office to general passenger agent in 11 years. Mr. Adson's successor has not been announced.

G. N. ORE A PUZZLE

COMING CANCELLATION OF LEASE BY STEEL TRUST CAUSES SPECULATION.

DIVIDENDS ARE EXPECTED SOON

Bulk of $10,000,000 in Royalties Due Certificate Holders Dec. 31—January Statement Will Clarify the Situation.

New York, N. Y. — Ever since it became known that the United States Steel corporation had decided to give notice to the trustees of the Great Northern ore properties of the intention to cancel the lease of those properties Jan. 1, 1915, holders of certificates of beneficial interest issued by the trustees, and Wall Street in general, have been more puzzled than ever as to the real value of the certificates. They are without fixed par value and no one outside of the trustees and a few other inside interests have had any data upon which to base an estimate of their intrinsic value.

Wall Street speculators, as well as investors, have been disinclined of late to buy certificates, because of the foregoing considerations, and scattered holders have been disposed to sell, although in most cases purchases were made on much higher levels. Not a few of these purchases were made by investors at 80 or higher. Recent prices have shown a loss of nearly 50 points on such investments.

Source of Dividend Money.

It is now asserted that the dividends thus far paid on certificates have not come from moneys received as royalties from the Great Western Mining company, but entirely from leases other than those of that company. It has not been generally known that such leases existed. Furthermore, it is stated that all moneys received from the Great Western Mining company, under the terms of the lease with the United States Steel corporation, are held by the trustees of the ore certificates, and have been invested in bonds and other securities. By the close of this year the sum that will have been received from this source will amount to $10,502,000.

The failure of the trustees to declare the usual semi-annual dividend of 50 cents a share within the last month or so, has caused comment as to the probable continuance of payments on certificates. It was suggested that the cancellation of the lease apparently meant a cessation of the income. But the sum that the trustees have on hand intact is large enough to warrant further payment, unless the money is being reserved for a specific purpose.

According to the estimates in 1907 the income from the holdings was about $3,000,000 a year, and that the trustees had a surplus of between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 on hand.

James J. Hill estimated the amount of ore in the lands at 500,000,000 tons, but it is declared that the estimates of the United States Steel corporation have shown about 357,000,000 tons in half of the property. A short time ago the state of Minnesota threatened to pass a law taxing all of the ore underground, and this led the steel corporation to stop prospecting for the time being. It is understood to have expended $13,000,000 in developing the ore properties.

When the lease is terminated on Dec. 31, 1914, the steel corporation will have paid for 27,000,000 tons of ore on which the royalties will aggregate $27,244,000. This sum is equal to over $18 a share for the Great Northern ore certificates, of which there are 1,500,000 without par value.

It is said to be the intention of the trustees to issue an annual statement in January in which the position of the properties will be made clear to certificate holders. On the stock exchange certificates advanced 2¼ points to 38⅝ on transactions in 5,900.

C. N. PARKER OF BRAINERD DEAD

Deceased Was Well Known in Business Circles of the Northwest.

Brainerd.—C. N. Parker, aged 77, one of the most prominent business men of Brainerd and the Northwest, died of paralysis. Mr Parker was associated with H. W. Topping, president of the park board of St Paul, in the foundry business, having a foundry at Brainerd and at one time foundries in St. Paul, Albana, Oregon and South Tacoma, Wash.

The first contract for foundry work of the Northern Pacific railway was taken by Mr. Parker in 1885. In early life he was a machinist and locomotive engineer and later master mechanic of the St. Paul & Pacific railway, now the Great Northern. He was a member of the fire commission in St. Paul in early years.

MUCH MILK SENT TO CANADA.

Minneapolis Ships Thousands of Gallons to Winnipeg.

Minneapolis.—Thousands of gallons of milk are shipped every day from Minneapolis to Winnipeg. On some days the consignments are as high as 8,000 gallons, according to Professor P. B. Tustin, chief food and dairy inspector of the Canadian city, who made investigation of dairy inspection in Minneapolis. He asserted that he had found marked improvement in the cleanliness of the city's milk supply.

Ordinary Man on the Street Somewhat Puzzled by Seeming Business Contradictions.

"Life is full of contradictions."

"Yes?"

"For instance, about six months ago a life insurance agent got after me, and hounded me nearly to death. I told him at the start that I had all the insurance I was able to carry, but he kept right on trying to persuade me that I needed more and, finally, in sheer desperation, I consented to take out another policy. Then the company's doctor began trying in every way he could think of to make it impossible for me to get the insurance. He acted as if I was voluntarily trying to beat the company in some way, and when I failed to pass the examination both he and the agent appeared to think I had wronged them by taking up their time."

"That's nearly as bad as my case. Several months ago representatives of a piano house got after me for the purpose of persuading me to buy a piano on the installment plan. Just to get rid of them I at last agreed to buy. Now they've got a corps of men out trying to dig up proof that I never could or would pay for the piano if they were to let me have it. Business is a great thing."

"Yes, it is true that it takes a lot of money to become an airman. You can't get an aeroplane and you can't learn to fly without plenty of cash."

Mr. Neely smiled.

"I was watching a brother airman making a volplane the other day, when I heard a young lady say:

"'He can do a lot of tricks, can't he?'

"'Yes, you bet he can,' her companion agreed.

"'What is his best trick?' she continued.

"'His best trick far and away,' was the reply, 'is buying a biplane on credit. He's done it twice now, and I shouldn't be surprised to see him pull it off a third time before he breaks his neck.'"

ALMOST FRANTIC WITH ITCHING ECZEMA

"Eight years ago I got eczema all over my hands. My fingers fairly bled and it itched until it almost drove me frantic. The eruption began with itching under the skin. It spread fast from between the fingers around the nails and all over the whole hands. I got a pair of rubber gloves in order to wash dishes. Then it spread all over the left side of my chest. A fine doctor treated the trouble two weeks, but did me no good. I cried night and day. Then I decided to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment but without much hope as I had gone so long. There was a marked change the second day, and so on until I was entirely cured. The Cuticura Soap we have always kept in our home, and we decided after that lesson that it is a cheap soap in price and the very best in quality. My husband will use no other soap in his shaving mug." (Signed) Mrs. G. A. Selby, Redonda Beach, Cal., Jan. 15, 1911. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. 24 K, Boston.

Knees Became Stiff

Five Years of Severe Rheumatism

The cure of Henry J. Goldstein, 14 Barton Street, Boston, Mass., is another victory for Hood's Sarsaparilla. This great medicine has succeeded in many cases where others have utterly failed. Mr. Goldstein says: "I suffered from rheumatism five years, it kept me from business and caused excruciating pain. My knees would become as stiff as steel. I tried many medicines without relief, then took Hood's Sarsaparilla, soon felt much better, and now consider myself entirely cured. I recommend Hood's."

Get it today in usual liquid form or chocolated tablets called Sarsatabs.

44 Bu. to the Acre

is a heavy yield, but that's what John Kennedy of Edmonton, Alberta, Western Canada, got from 40 acres of Spring Wheat in 1910. Reports from other districts in that province showed other excellent results—such as 4,000 bushels of wheat from 120 acres, or 33 1-3 bu. per acre. 25, 30 and 40 bushel yields were numerous. As high as 132 bushels of oats to the acre were threshed from Alberta fields in 1910.

The FIGHT AGAINST the OPIUM EVIL

THE past few months have witnessed political changes in China that are fraught with grave import for the people of the most populous country on the globe. At the same time there has been working to a culmination another evolution in public affairs that holds almost as much significance for the inhabitants of the Orient as does the upheaval of the machinery of government. This late development is a crusade to free the Chinese, and, incidentally, other peoples of the world, from the bondage of the opium habit which has for so many years been a drag upon their intellectual and material progress.

We, as Americans, must feel an especial pride and interest in this breaking of the grip of the deadliest drug habit because it has been brought about largely through the efforts of the United States. Or, in other words, Uncle Sam set the ball rolling. At first the movement simply had as its object the banishment of opium from China, but gradually the scope of the anti-opium "missionary work" expanded until it embraced the whole world—every section of the globe where the use of opium has become a habit—and finally within the past few months the fight against the evil has been expanded in scope until it embraces prohibitive or restrictive action not only against opium, but also against morphine, cocaine, and, in short, all habit-forming drugs.

TYPE OF VESSELS USED IN THE OPIUM TRAFFIC

The fight against the opium evil, with Uncle Sam as the chief aggressor, has been going on steadily for some years past but it is only now on the eve of complete success that it has come to attract attention from all classes of the community. From the time when Chinese began to settle in the United States, bringing with them, many of them, their love of opium smoking it was realized that the evil was one the menace of which would sooner or later be brought home to our people—particularly those residing on the Pacific slope and in the western section of the country where the bulk of the Mongolians settled.

However, it was only after Uncle Sam came into possession of the Philippines, following the Spanish-American war, that our public men and government officials were thoroughly aroused to the necessity of grappling with the problem. In the Philippines our people found great numbers of Chinese who were confirmed opium smokers, and, worse yet, they were rapidly teaching the destructive habit to the natives of the islands. There was much agitation of the subject both in the Philippines and here in the United States and the upshot of the matter was that the congress of the United States passed laws prohibiting the importation of opium into the Philippines except for medicinal purposes. From that moment there was a marked improvement of conditions.

The example of Uncle Sam's action and the complete success which attended it, awakened China to her own need and gave hope of a solution. The progressive men of China were deeply moved by the spectacle of another nation (and one that had always been traditionally friendly to China) combating at the very doors of the Orient with an evil that was realized by all thinking men to be sapping the life blood of a large share of Asia's population. The result was a strong anti-opium movement in China and out of this grew a direct appeal to then President Roosevelt from representatives of missionary societies in the Far East and from commercial organizations and institutions in the United States. It was the plea of these various interests that the United States government, considering its historical attitude in regard to the opium traffic in the Orient, should take the initiative in assisting China to secure the prohibition of that traffic.

This was in the year 1904, but it was a couple of years later that definite plans were made for an international concert of action in the matter. In that year Bishop Charles H. Brent of the Philippines, who was, naturally, in a position to appreciate the havoc wrought by opium, wrote to President Roosevelt appealing to him "to promote some movement that would gather in its embrace representatives from all the countries where the traffic in and the use of opium is a matter of moment." Thereupon President Roosevelt had his secretary of state, Mr. Elihu Root, open up correspondence with all the powers having possessions in the Far East to ascertain if it would not be possible to form a distinguished international commission that would study the opium problem as it then appeared in the quarter of the globe where it had proven the greatest menace, and would, further, report the wisest measures for bettering the situation.

It required a year and a half of letter writing, back and forth, before the governments concerned could be induced to meet each other on a common basis. In explanation of this reluctance it may be pointed out that a number of the countries, notably Great Britain, and her colonies, France, Holland and Siam, derive large revenues from the opium traffic, and in some instances opium production is a government monopoly. Should the traffic in opium be virtually abolished, as it is likely to be in time, these various powers stand to lose revenue to the enormous aggregate of one hundred million dollars a year. No wonder they hesitated. However, in the end the common cause of humanity triumphed and it was arranged that an international opium commission should be created.

This commission, which took up its work at the city of Shanghai, China, early in the year 1909, discussed all phases of the moral, economic, scientific and political aspects of the opium problem, not only as existing in the Far East but throughout the world. The outcome of the gathering was the unanimous adoption of a series of recommendations in which the delegates and experts assembled, strongly urged that their respective countries take action in three matters, namely an overhauling by each nation of its own regulations with reference to the opium traffic; the adoption of measures for the suppression of opium smoking, and, finally, the enforcement of restrictions upon the manufacture and sale of morphine.

The experts of the different nations having agreed upon the measures that ought to be taken to curb the evil, it was up to the United States, she having inaugurated the project, to make the next move in the matter. This she did with no loss of time. Our officials wrote to the various powers suggesting that they get together and take action on the recommendations that had come from Shanghai. In other words, it was suggested that as a sequel to the earlier effort there should now be international co-operation for the placing of the production and traffic in opium under international law.

The culmination of the long fight is now in sight. An international conference was held recently at The Hague, the capital of the Netherlands, to arrange for measures that will put up the bars against opium and other habit-forming drugs all over the world. Many of the men who attended the Shanghai conference were appointed by their respective governments to represent them at The Hague. The power and significance of the two gatherings was vastly different, however. At the Shanghai conference those in attendance could only advise and recommend. At The Hague conference the delegates were empowered by their respective governments to agree upon definite measures. After prolonged sessions, measures were decided upon which, it is expected, will fully carry out and put into effect the objects of the conference. These measures will be reported to the various governments represented, to be followed by legislative action on the part of their law-making bodies putting into execution the regulations agreed upon. This is supposedly a mere matter of routine, as all the powers have given their promise.

Foremost of the regulations agreed upon are those for uniform national laws and regulations to control the production, manufacture and distribution of opium and its derivatives. Almost as important will be the regulation by the universal postal union of the transmission of opium through the mails. Going yet further in the direction of complete control will be the restrictions that are to be placed upon the cultivation of the poppy, from which opium is derived, and limiting the number of ports through which the drug may be shipped by opium-producing countries. There was adopted also uniform marks of identification for packages containing opium in international transit.

The nations that are interested in this world-wide crusade and were represented at the conference include the United States, China, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Russia and Siam. Some of the other powers, notably Austria-Hungary, were not directly represented because they are not much affected by the opium evil, but they have given assurance that they will abide by the regulations which have been agreed upon by the conference. When the international conference was first proposed, China showed her intense interest by appointing a strong delegation including such progressive men as Dr. Yen, who was educated in American colleges and is in sympathy with American ideas and ideals.

CALIFORNIA TREASURE STORY

The story of a wound received in the Civil war which sealed the hiding place of a fortune for more than half a century and of a strange trick of fate which cleared the hider's memory in the evening of life was brought to Los Angeles by the hider's son, J. K. Anderson of New Orleans, who is at the Van Nuys en route to the old placer mining fields of California, says the Los Angeles Herald.

Anderson's father joined in the gold rush and was one of the miners of the '49 days. He located a claim in Placer county, near Auburn and Newcastle. Within a year he had snatched from the river bottoms a fortune. Then the call of the south for volunteers reached him. He buried the gold beneath the adobe blocks of a tavern in the vicinity of his claim, strapped all the precious substance he could carry about his body and hurried to join the Confederate army.

Anderson says that his father was struck in an engagement with the Union troops by a bullet which tore open his scalp and robbed him of his memory for fifty years. During that time, the son says, the parent was like a child with all knowledge of the hiding place of the gold gone. Before he died, a year ago, his memory of the gold rush returned to him and he was living again in the past that preceded his part in the conflict.

It was during these last moments that the old man told his son and the mother where he had buried what he claimed was a fortune. The son is hurrying to unearth if possible the buried treasure. Anderson said:

"My father said he buried the gold under a corner of an old adobe tavern patronized by the miners in the early days. This tavern was in Long valley at a point halfway, I have learned, between the present towns of Newcastle and Auburn. I have learned through correspondence that a family by the name of Scott occupies the tavern as a farmhouse and that the country around it is devoted to the raising of citrus fruits.

"No one has disturbed the original lines of the building. The adobe blocks are heavy. I have obtained permission from the owners to prosecute my search and will give them a share of my findings. Otherwise I would have to buy the property."

Anderson is a civil engineer. He was engaged by the government for some time in work on the Panama canal, but has left his employment to search for the treasure which he maintains his father has hidden in the old placer mining fields of California.

Trained Nurse Who Snores

"In all those months I was in the hospital somebody ought to have warned me, I think," said the trained nurse, according to the New York Times. "Of course I had it from the folks at home that I snored a little, but I never took it seriously until I went on my first case. I found then that it is a serious matter for a nurse to snore.

"I took the case from a nurse whose own health had broken down. The patient was nervous and excited over the contemplated change, and that made my ordeal more severe; a brand new case of my own would have been much easier. Still, we got along fairly well together the first half of the night. He was a kindly man, and soon after midnight he insisted that I should try to get some sleep. I didn't think I'd catch a wink, but by and by I dozed off. It was a fatal sleep for me. The next morning the patient's sister told me about the snoring.

"'James could not rest at all,' she said. 'I heard you in the next room.'

"Before night I was looking for another job. Of course I did not have to give up nursing entirely, but the hard cases, where I am required to keep awake every second, are open to me. All those soft snaps that give you a chance to sleep half the night are beyond the reach of the snoring nurse."

Unintentional Truth.

"The latest agony," said a spendthrift to his dissipated companion, "is the way I felt this morning. My wife asked me for a £10 note and I cut the matter short by telling her that it could not be done, for the simple reason that I had only a matter of 5 bob or so in my pocket.

"'I knew you'd tell me that,' she said, 'and it's true, too.' And as I looked up in amazement she added, 'I looked in your pockets last night. I've got the £10 note.'

"Fancy how I felt! But what could I do?"—London Tit-Bits.

Plausible.

EGYPT'S MUMMIFIED MONKEYS

Some Specimens of the Hideous Objects Found in the Tomb of Amenhotep II.

Boston, Mass.—It is no strange thing for a man to have household pets chosen from among the numberless forms of life in the animal world, but his attachment is seldom so great as to result in the preservation of their bodies after death, as was done by some of the ancient rulers of Egypt.

Possibly the man of today who erects a monument to mark the last resting place of his pet dog would gladly follow in the footsteps of the Egyptian by preserving the remains of various other pets, if he knew how. It is much better that he does not possess this knowledge. For one thing, the country would be more or less littered up with animal mummies, and we have about all the junk we can consistently care for as it is.

Mummified Monkeys of Egypt.

When Amenophis, or Amenhotep II., succeeded his father, Thotmes III., on the throne of Egypt in 1814 B. C., he was destined to a short reign. It was a lively one, however, for he took Nineveh by assault and conquered the Ethiopians. Some writers even identify him with Memnon, who fought in the Trojan war. One would scarcely expect so active a warrior to spend much of his time in fondling pets about the palace, yet this King was very fond of monkeys and enjoyed having many of them around him during his reign of about a dozen years. This has been proven in recent years by the finding in his tomb of their mummified remains.

Other curious contents of the tomb were mummified ducks and chickens, but it is not likely these were considered as pets by this old-time ruler. These latter were preserved in wooden vessels, carved to represent the bird they contained in this old tomb. The oddest finds in this old tomb, however, was a vessel containing honey, which had retained its delicious flavor all these thousands of years since Amenhotep II. himself was laid away amid such strange surroundings.

A look at the picture, showing some of his companions, impels one to wonder if the King's slumber was ever broken by any strange or fantastic dreams.

PINES RELICS OF DIM PAST

There Are Now but Two Small Groves of the Torrey Species in the World.

San Diego, Cal.—Possibly no other tree that grows has so small a geographic range as the Torrey pine. There are but two small groves of this species of pine in the world. One is about 18 miles north of San Diego, Cal., and the other is on Santa Rosa group. It is evident that the Torrey pine, like the giant redwoods of the Sierras and the Monterery cypress, is a relic of a past geological epoch.

The grove north of San Diego is the largest of the two that still exist. Here the trees are found close to the ocean, on a rugged and inhospitable coast, where they are swept alternately by the westerly winds off the Pacific, and by hot blasts from the deserts in the interior. Probably it is owing to this situation that the trees are dwarfed in size, and that most of them are grotesque and fantastic in shape.

The Torrey Pine.

When planted in favorable regions, the Torrey pines grow tall and straight, and grow very rapidly. They are of little value for the purpose of the lumberman, and are not often planted except for shade and ornamental purposes.

Dies of a Broken Heart.

Hempstead, L. I.—Extreme grief over the tragic fate of her little girl caused Mrs. Kate Bleowski to die of a broken heart. Last week the little one was fatally burned at a bonfire in front of her home here and as she was carried into the house the mother collapsed. She remained in a semiconscious condition until her death. The attending physician says that her death was due solely to a broken heart.

Doctor Chokes a Rabid Dog to Death

I COULD DO THIS ALL DAY

NEW YORK.—Dr. E. B. Ackerman, veterinarian of the health department, is nursing a couple of slightly strained wrists that have bothered him a little since the day when he was obliged to use all the strength that was in them to strangle a rabid Boston bull terrier that was getting ready to present the doctor with an attack of hydrophobia.

The health department got a hurry call on the phone from Mrs. [illegible] Hatch to the effect that a mad [illegible] had taken possession of her apartment, and as she had left some dishes cooking on the stove, she would be greatly obliged if some one were sent at once to remove the intruder.

Dr. Ackerman was given the assignment, and when he got to Mrs. Hatch's place she told him that the dog had crawled into a closet, that she had shut the door and had locked the creature in.

Dr. Ackerman unlocked the door and whistled. There was an instant response on the part of the Boston bull, which had as much froth on his face as adorns the top of a summer schooner at Coney. The dog's mouth was wide open and his biting apparatus was in fine order.

The veterinarian met him half way, and with a knack learned by long experience, grabbed the beast tightly about the neck with both hands. He pressed both thumbs carefully on the jugular vein and the windpipe and held on grimly, urged on by the frightened screams of Mrs. Hatch, who pleaded with him not to let go.

It was all over in less than five minutes, and the dog was stretched out on the kitchen floor in a perfectly harmless condition. The remains, froth and all, were sent to the research laboratory in Manhattan, and a report received by the Brooklyn office of the health department confirmed Dr. Ackerman's diagnosis that the dog had rabies.

Missionary Work in Chicago's Slums

CHICAGO.—A great religious movement has been started in this city by the Presbyterian Church Extension board, and its example is likely to be imitated in other big cities of the world. The Extension board has asked for 1,000 volunteers to carry the message of the Gospel to the natives of many distant lands—to followers of Confucius, of Zoroaster, of Mohammed and of many pagan gods. These workers are asked to give their time without recompense, other than the consciousness of work well done. They are expected to enter into dark places to spread the light, brave pestilence, heal the sick, and establish places for physical and mental recreation, where nothing but drudgery and care is now known.

But with all this there are few dangers. None of the volunteers will be eaten by cannibals; none will be staked out on the desert sands to die of heat and thirst; none will be crucified, burned at the stake or impaled. For all will do their work right here in Chicago.

THERE IS PLENTY OF WORK FOR MISSIONARIES RIGHT HERE

Modern industrialism has brought all the world to Chicago. Almost every religion under the sun is represented here, and it will be the work of these volunteers to Christianize the residents—and especially the children—of the Persian colony, the Chinese colony, the Arabian colony and all the other colonies of foreigners which go to make up the cosmopolitan city.

The appeal for workers to labor in this field is made on the ground that unless American Christian ideals govern the lives of the foreign born, the ideals of Americans will in a generation be supplanted by those of Europe or Asia, because the children of foreign parentage far outnumber the American born and will in a generation outvote them.

Boys Risk Lives to Save Fishermen

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Jack London probably never heard of Eddie Deering of Brooklyn or "Darky Sam" of Coney Island, but they deserve to take rank with some of the heroes that London has made famous, for they did some extraordinary stunts in rescuing five men from the launch Sterling of Astoria, which got into serious trouble off the old iron pier just before sunset.

Neither Eddie nor Sam could swim, but when they saw the launch drifting helplessly in the rough sea about a half mile off shore, and saw the occupants waving their arms and shouting for help, they did what heroes usually do in such cases like that. They took a long chance and came out of the adventure soaked to the skin.

The first thing they did was to try to get a boat, but according to the story told by Deering they visited nearly every pavilion from Balmer's to Steeplechase Park without success. Those who owned boats refused to lend them. They returned to the spot where the boat was plunging in the waves, and found an old flat-bottomed rowboat, half buried in the sand. With two boards as oars they paddled out to the Sterling. Two trips were made, and all hands, except Capt. Fisher, who declined to abandon his craft, were taken to the bench. Finally the police boat came to the scene and towed the Sterling to Astoria.

Deering said he was glad to have been able to help in the work of rescue, but he would not go through the experience again for $1,000.

"Not one o' the blokes even said 'thank you,'" was his comment on the behavior of those who had been saved by himself and "Darky Sam."

A Plague of Rats Afflicts Winnipeg

WINNIPEG, Man.—The brown rat has reached Winnipeg. According to the statistics of the department of agriculture of the province there is an area of 90 miles long abutting the United States on its northern frontier and 60 miles wide in which the rats have made their appearance.

Mr. Golden, the deputy minister, estimates that the damage done this year by the brown rat is $1,000,000, and it will proportionately increase unless the people generally awaken to the seriousness of the situation.

According to the deputy minister, the rats in the province move in a radius of 15 miles each year, and he has compiled many valuable statistics relating to the rat. Two years ago the department conducted a series of investigations and produced virus that it was thought would eliminate the pest. There was quite a considerable amount of interest at first, and many applications were made for the virus. Minister Golden conducted some interesting experiments at Gretna, a town a few miles from the frontier of the United states last year, to determine the amount of food the rat would consume a day, and at the same time to test the virus. The rats were caught and one of them received an injection of the virus. Within two days it died, and the other rat, not having been provided with food, proceeded to devour its dead comrade. Within 24 hours it had consumed all of the dead rat with the exception of half an inch of the tail, and it succumbed within a few hours to the poison which had been injected into the other rat.

IN THE LIMELIGHT

IS PROMINENT IN CONGRESS

John Sharp Williams, senator from Mississippi, is one of the picturesque figures in congress. Two things make him [illegible] One is his deafness, which is considerable, and which they say is growing on him. As a result of it he continually keeps his hand hollowed to his ear and frequently has to ask to have the question repeated to him. The other is his habit—a result, probably of his deafness—of moving about the senate during debate. He does not like to sit still. He walks—softly and gracefully—from his chair toward the man whom he is talking at, with his right forefinger extended and accusing his opponent, and with his left hand helping him to hear. Apparently he never for a moment thinks that he is conspicuous or picturesque.

Williams is attractive in speech as well as picturesque in garb, and manner. The press gallery, that collection of cynics and expert listeners, usually fills up when the rumor passes around that Williams is on his feet. Williams knows how to debate. With him debate is not merely contradicting what some other fellow has said, or else appealing to the constitution of the United States as the Bible of all political and economic philosophy. He debates with finesse and style.

NEW LEADER OF THE REDS

The job of handling the Cincinnati team has fallen to Hank O'Day, for many years a well-known National league umpire. A number of the best known players in the country were mentioned for the position of manager, but the selection of O'Day was in the nature of a big surprise. O'Day was a pitcher before he joined the ranks of umpires 12 years ago. He twirled for the New York Giants and other of the big league teams and was accounted one of the best box artists on the diamond. He has never been tried in a managerial position and there will be much interest manifested in the manner in which he will succeed in Cincinnati, where so many good baseball pilots have made failures in building up a strong team.

O'Day is a man of excellent judgment and tact and has the necessary amount of nerve to back up his opinions. When brought up against a ticklish proposition he has never been found wanting. The best evidence of the fairness and courage which are notable portions of his character was furnished in that September game in New York in 1908, when he made a decision against Merkel which cost the Giants the pennant, and which he could have sidestepped, if he had been that kind of a man. The decision cost the Giants the pennant, and O'Day was roundly criticised by the partisan fans of the Giants, but he cared nothing for that.

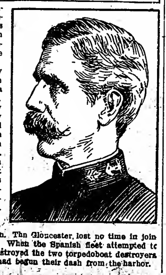
MODERN ORIENTAL PRINCE

The Gaekwar of Baroda is essentially a modern monarch. His palace is furnished in many respects quite like a New York mansion, he has a big bank in the capital of his state, which was organized by an American, his son is being educated in an American college, his wife is encouraged to go in for the "fripperies" beloved of American women—and now the Gaekwar has been named co-respondent in a suit for divorce!

Some unhappy Englishman, not identified as yet, who wishes to be freed from his wife, claims the fascinating Gaekwar is to blame for his domestic troubles. Through his attorney, the latter, although he doesn't bother to deny his connection with the case, claims loftily that being a prince of India, he is outside the jurisdiction of the court. This idea the opposing counsel turns down flatly and the point is being argued at great length.

The Gaekwar, who is well known and very popular in London, visited the United States last year accompanied by his wife to get ideas on the development of manufacturing in his state, one of the smallest, but one of the most important in India. As one of the three Indian rulers entitled to a salute of 21 guns the Gaekwar is held in veneration by his people.

'FIGHTING DICK' IS OUT



The official life of "one of the greatest fighters, best fellows and most beloved officers the service afloat has ever had" expired the other day, when Rear Admiral Richard Wainwright retired from active service, owing to the age limit.

No officer in the United States navy was better known or better liked than "Fighting Dick" Wainwright. His record of service is long and efficient. He graduated from the Naval Academy in 1868, but it was not until the early 90's that his name began to be heard outside the service. He was executive officer of the Battleship Maine when she was blown up in Havana harbor.

When war was declared with Spain Capt. Wainwright was among the first to apply for active service. He was delighted when he was placed in command of J. Pierpont Morgan's transformed pleasure yacht, the Corsair. The little vessel was renamed the Gloucester, in honor of the Massachusetts city where Wainwright was born. The Gloucester lost no time in joining the blockading fleet at Santiago. When the Spanish fleet attempted to escape the Gloucester pounded and destroyed the two torpedoboat destroyers Pluton and Furor, ere they scarcely had begun their dash from the harbor.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Historic Washington Home Is to Go

BIRTHPLACE OF NELLIE CUSTIS
IT'S GOT TER GO— I NEED TH' LAND TER MAKE MORE BRICKS

WASHINGTON.—Steam shovels are eating their way into the birthplace of Nellie Custis, granddaughter of Mrs. George Washington and ward and adopted daughter of Washington. Year by year the shovels have dug nearer to the old and battered frame house where the most popular woman of the late revolutionary and the early republican eras came into the world and where her childhood was spent. Now the deep clay pits are but a few yards from the house and probably not many months will pass when the house will be no more. The clay exhausted and the [illegible] the fields reduced about [illegible], the place may be converted into railroad yards by the Washington Southern railroad—the Washington-Richmond line.

Abingdon was a great estate, but the house was never a noble bit of building, according to an exchange. When John Parke Custis married Nellie Calvert of Maryland he seems to have caused the erection of this ample though plain dwelling with the idea that later he would erect a house in keeping with his wealth and standing in the community. Abingdon, being a Custis home, was directly or remotely associated with nearly all the colonial and revolutionary families in Virginia and Maryland. The house was built by John Parke Custis in 1778.

John Parke Custis was descended from John Custis, who came to Virginia from Holland in 1640. The son of this immigrant, John Custis II., built Arlington house in Northampton county, Virginia, naming it after Henry, the earl of Arlington, who, with Lord Culpeper, held Virginia under patent from Charles II.

Young Custis bought from Gerald Alexander 1,100 acres of land, part of which is now Arlington National cemetery. He built Abingdon House and there in 1779 Eleanor Parke Custis (Nellie Custis) was born. John Parke Custis, an aid on Washington's staff, died at Yorktown in 1781 and Washington adopted Nellie and her young brother, George Washington Parke Custis. The children thereafter made their home at Mount Vernon.

Chinese to Adopt Western Calendar

THE adoption of the western calendar was among the many changes ordered in decree issued by the cabinet in China, according to advices transmitted to the state department through the Chinese charge d'affaires in this city. The message also confirms the reported retirement of the prince regent and his return to the order of imperial princes, and the appointment of Shi-Heu and Hsu Shih Chang as guardians of the emperor. The message says that Chow Tszchi has been appointed assistant minister of finance. The department was also informed that by a decree issued Chinese subjects are permitted to cut off their cues.

When the Chinese government ordered that the western method of reckoning months and years be adopted, the date jumped from the 19th day of the tenth month to the third year of Heunntung to the 9th day of the eleventh month of the year 1911 A. D. It was a long jump, apparently, and in reality the change to the use of the Gregorian calendar, used by most of the great nations of the world, was a significant step in China's advance toward modern civilization.

For centuries it has been the custom in China to reckon the days of the year by the lune calendar, each year having 360 days, and the months having twenty-nine or thirty days, as the case might be. Every third year it was necessary to slip in an extra month so as to keep the season in place and the years running smoothly. Whenever a new emperor ascended the throne the Chinese began to reckon their years all over again. The day of the year, however, did not change with the coming of a new ruler, but it became that day and month of the first year of ———, and the new ruler's name was given.

Form of Court Oath May be Changed

FORM OF COURT OATH TO BE CHANGED SOON—
DEY SHOULD CUT IT OUT ALL-TO-GEDDER-

THE bill recently introduced by Senator Burton of Ohio, which proposes to change the form of oath in federal courts and elsewhere under the jurisdiction of the United States, is in the hands of the judiciary committee of the senate and is now being considered with a view of early action upon the subject. The bill, of which Charles J. Bonaparte, the former attorney general of the United States, and Dr. Ira Remsen, president of Johns Hopkins university, are the sponsors, does not contemplate to change the religious character of the oath. The principal change which it proposes is the omission of the expression "So help me God" at the end of an oath and the substitution of "promise" or "declare" for the word "swear" in the formula.

Since the introduction of Senator Burton's bill the attention of the judiciary committee has been called to the fact that several of the most progressive countries of Europe have materially changed and modernized the ancient and antiquated forms of the oaths used in judicial proceedings. No country as yet has gone quite so far as Switzerland.

The cantons of Zurich and Aargau took the radical step of entirely abolishing the oath several years ago, and the result has been so satisfactory that there is no desire to return to the old system.

Great Wood Waste a National Peril

A GREAT undeveloped industry, worth millions of dollars annually, lies at the doors of the people of the south and the far northwest in the immense wastes of wood incident to the manufacture of lumber.

An amazing statement of these wastes and the consequent loss in wealth and conservation of timber resources is made as a result of a two-year government investigation, not yet concluded, by F. P. Veitch, chief of the leather and paper division of the bureau of chemistry, and M. G. Donk, assistant chemist, whose preliminary conclusions have just been made public.

"The waste wood of the south and northwest from the lumber industry—tops, stumps, slabs and sawdust and the dead and down timber from fires and storms—supplies one of the great undeveloped resources of this country," say the investigators. "From this wood, by industrially developed chemical methods, the entire output of naval stores, embracing turpentine, rosin, tars, pitch, rosin spirits and rosin oils, having an annual value of at least $30,000,000, may be obtained without boxing or turpentining a single live tree.

"It is possible to recover from the wastes of the yellow-pine lumber industry (including dead-and-down timber) as much or more turpentine, rosin and rosin oils as now are produced by the ordinary methods of turpentining from the living tree. The profitable utilization of mill wastes in this way would add materially to the wealth of the south and help to conserve its timber resources."

WAR IN THE TIPPING NUISANCE.

If the commercial travelers of this country really do go after the tipping system with all the power they possess, they can nearly, if not entirely, destroy it. Their national president avows his determination to rally the organization to an assault upon this graft, which, he says, foots up $50,000,000 a year in the United States. If these figures even approximate the facts, tipping is more than a nuisance to individuals, it is an enormous tax upon business that should not be tolerated. It has made parasites not only of a horde of servants, but of certain lines of business, which thus, through underpaid employes, prey upon other businesses. Tipping might find some plausibility if it amounted only to gratuities to a faithful servant seeking to please, but everybody knows that it goes far beyond this, says the Omaha Bee. The tip is more often given, not for extra service, but to get any kind of service at all. It is not surprising that commercial travelers think of organizing a united attack upon tipping. The surprise is that they have not done so long years ago. They practically live on the road, in hotels and trains a good part of the year. That sort of life is hard at best. To make the most of it they pay tips that they may obtain a living existence, so to speak. The commercial travelers can destroy the tip if they will. They can get no-tip hotels when they unitedly demand them and they can get, at least, some improvement in conditions even from the sleeping car company. If they succeed they will have the thanks of everyone who ever travels away from home.

Theoretically, says a jeweler, the best watches of today are perfect, but actually they both gain and lose time every day. Even if the good watch does not vary one second at the end of the 24 hours, the expert insists, it has both gained and lost in that time. If it is wound in the morning, it runs fast, and toward the next morning runs slow, thus equalizing the time. He says the best watches should be wound twice a day and then at only two-thirds of the capacity of the mainspring, thus preventing either binding or extremes of strong or weakened spring. The balance wheel was expected to equalize differences of mainspring tension, but really this is not the case to what is called perfection.

The utility of the all steel train as a life-saver was demonstrated in New Jersey last week when such a train taking a crossover switch at 50 miles an hour was completely derailed and overturned. Here would have been a horror involving the crushing and burning to death of imprisoned passengers had the coaches been of wood. But the steel coaches did not collapse and did not burn, and the only casualties were the deaths of the engineer and fireman. The passengers were not even injured.

It seems that Sappho has been misunderstood all this time. Instead of being a pale poetess of purple passion she was merely a calm and classical schoolteacher. We will learn next that Cleopatra was only a circus snake-charmer with the P. T. Barnum of the times.

FIGHT ON INCREASE

Higher Rates on Second-Class Mail Opposed.

BULLETIN FROM PUBLISHERS

Postal Committee of the A. N. P. A. Calls the Post Office a Badly Managed Business.

Washington.—The protest of the publishers against the proposition to increase second-class mail rates as the congressional post office commission desires is growing stronger daily. The Illinois Daily Newspaper Publishers' association registered its objections recently, and now the American Newspaper Publishers' association's postal committee, of which the chairman is Don C. Seitz of the New York World, has issued the following bulletin:

"The extent to which the post office department does not carry second-class matter is well revealed in the following abstract of inquiry of publishers conducted by house committee on expenditures in the post office department (William A. Ashbrook, chairman) concerning the volume, weight and handling of the output of publications entered as mail matter of the second-class for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911:

"'Inquiry was made of all publishers, approximating thirty thousand, of which nearly seventeen thousand are weekly publications.

"'More than ten thousand returns were received, embracing sixty-six plus per cent. of all tonnage of publications.

"'The publications reporting represent an annual output of more than six and one-half billion copies, the weight of which was one and three-quarter billion pounds.

"'These publications delivered by mail in such period weighed 633,012,902 pounds.

"'They delivered by their own carriers, newsboys, and news companies 840,466,574 pounds, of which an unascertained percentage was carried to destination by express and other rail shipments outside the mail. They delivered by express, 202,729,510 pounds, and by other rail shipments 121,494,748 pounds. The rate by express and rail varies from ¼ to 1 cent per pound, but the bulk of these shipments went at a rate of ¼ to ½ cent per pound.

"'The post office for the year ending June 30, 1911, handled 951,001,669, and excluding one-half million pounds free in county matter, it received one cent per pound.'

"All this goes to add to the absurdity of the proposed Hitchcock legislation doubling the second-class rate from one to two cents per pound, and limiting the 'privilege' to publications that carry as much reading matter as they do advertising.

"The proposition was stupid enough when the postal deficit reached $17,000,000 two years ago. It becomes preposterous in face of a surplus.

"What business has a transportation corporation, which is all the post office is, to prescribe how a business shall be conducted?

"Newspapers cannot afford to expand their columns beyond the call of the day's news, nor can they be expected to control the requirements of their advertisers who have a right to reach the public as copiously as they care to.

"It cannot be assumed that such legislation will ever get by congress. But publishers are requested to fight the theory that the right to send their output by mail is a "privilege." The figures show it is not.

"The post office is a badly managed business. That is all. We should fight its dictation, its censorship and its inefficiency."

Brigand Also a Patriot.

Gravely, solemnly, with enthusiasm and a large mixture of national pride, the Turkish newspapers publish the following remarkable piece of news (says the London Globe). A brigand chief, one Salin, who has been carrying on operations for some time in the mountains of Gamblek, in Bithynia, not a great distance from Constantinople, and for whom the Turkish gendarmerie have for long sought in vain, alive or dead, has placed his talents and services at the disposition of the Turkish authorities. The brigand's letter is a curious document. He says it is against the wishes of his heart to give up his calling, but "the audacity of these Italian brigands"—an expression which frequently occurs in the letter—in waging war upon the Ottoman empire and brutally seizing an Islamic province, impel him to offer his services, with those of his band, consisting of a hundred men, to avenge the national honor and to chastise these infidel brigands.

"I asked the audience to lend me their ears," said the verbose speaker. "But in three-quarters of an hour they were dozing." "I see," replied the financier "They called the loan."

MILLION IN DEBT

EDWARD R. THOMAS, FORMER BANKER, CONFESSES JUDGMENT FOR $1,234,487.

HAS AN INCOME OF $160,000

Panic of 1907 Is Blamed for Financial Undermining of Spectacular Plunger—Was Associate of Morse, Heinze, Leiter and Blaine.

New York.—With an income of $160,000 a year Edward R. Thomas, former wealthy Chicago banker, is a bankrupt. He confessed liabilities in the supreme court of $1,234,487.

At the time this confession of judgment was filed there was signed by Supreme Court Justice Giegrich an order garnisheeing the $160,000 income that Thomas draws from the estate of his father, the late Gen. Samuel Thomas, each year. This order was granted to the Bowling Green Trust company, a creditor for $59,100, and will permit the company to apply $16,000 of Thomas' income annually toward payment of the debt.

Thomas, who was a dashing figure in the world of finance, has been in Paris for two years with his wife, Mrs. Linda Lee Thomas, who was one of the celebrated beauties of Newport and New York. Thomas went abroad after being crippled in an automobile accident in 1908.

The big judgment against Thomas is the result of the 1907 panic.

LABOR ASKS DEFENSE FUND

Will Attempt to Raise $25,000 to Aid Indicted Union Leaders at Muscatine, Ia.

Muscatine, Ia.—An effort will be made to raise a $25,000 defense fund, to be used in the cases of Emmett Flood of Chicago, national organizer for the American Federation of Labor, and O. C. Wilson, business agent of the Button Workers' union and Socialist member of the city council, according to an announcement by labor officials here.

Both men were indicted by the grand jury, charged with conspiracy to destroy property in connection with the button workers' strike.

A petition charging O. C. Wilson with neglect of duty and asking that he be removed from office as alderman, was filed with the city council.

CLOCKS STOPPED BY QUAKE

Four California Towns Shaken, Windows Broken in Two Where Shocks Last Five Seconds.

Reno, Nev.—An earthquake shock was felt at Alvord, Cal., at Laws and at Bishop Thursday night. The duration was five seconds at Laws and at Bishop the shock was the worst felt in its history. Electric clocks were stopped and windows broken.

At Fresno there were three successive shocks, from north to south, two strong, then a weak one a few moments later. No damage is reported.

EVANS LAID TO REST

DEAD SEA FIGHTER ACCORDED FULL MILITARY FUNERAL.

President Taft, Statesmen, Army and Navy Officials and Diplomats in Attendance at Final Rites.

Washington.—The funeral of the late Robley D. Evans (retired), rear admiral of the United States, was held here. Full naval honors were accorded and his body was laid to rest in the national cemetery at Arlington.

President Taft, statesmen, warriors and diplomats alike joined in paying their respects, and attended the funeral services as a last tribute to one of the nation's greatest sea fighters.

The services were held at All Souls church, and were conducted by Rev. U. G. B. Pierce, the pastor. Rev. Dr. Millburn of Baltimore officiate at the cemetery. The honorary pall bearers were Rear Admirals W. H. Brownson, Seaton Schroeder, C. H. Stockton, J. E. Pillsbury, R. F. Nicholson and W. Swift, and Major Generals S. J. S. Sanger and A. G. McCook.

A full brigade of midshipmen from the Naval academy at Annapolis preceded the body from the family residence, 324 Indiana avenue, northwest, to the church and thence to the cemetery at Arlington. Admiral Evans always has expressed his interest in the young officers who turned out from the Annapolis academy.

Rear Admiral R. D. Evans.

The body was borne upon a flag draped caisson, accompanied by the active and honorary pall-bearers. The active pallbearers were blue jackets from the president's yacht Mayflower. In the escort were two companies of sailors from the Washington navy yard, four companies of marines from the Washington barracks and a battalion of field artillery from Fort Myer.

FIRE PERILS MANY MAN LOSES LIFE AND 200 OTHER PERSONS ARE ENDANGERED AS CHICAGO HOTEL BURNS.

OLD LANDMARK WIPED OUT

Frigid Weather Handicaps Firemen in Battle to Save Transit House in Stockyard Section—Many Thrilling Rescues Are Made.

Chicago.—One man was burned to death; seven others were injured; a score of men and women were rendered unconscious by the suffocating smoke. Nearly 200 others were imperiled and one of Chicago's oldest landmarks was wiped out, when the Transit house, West Forty-first and South Halsted streets, was razed by fire.

Many thrilling rescues were made by firemen, policemen and citizens The guests had barely time to flee The flames ate their way to the roof with startling rapidity. The fire also communicated with the Stock Yards savings bank building and the building occupied by the Live Stock World.

While thirty-five companies under Fire Marshal Seyferlich, with numbed fingers, ice-covered garments and hose were striving to check the fire, with an all to deficient water pressure, other companies were fighting other fires and making rescues in other parts of the city. Whole families in some cases were driven out into the freezing air.

The fire in the Transit house started in the provision room of the bakeshop off the kitchen, where three women and Peter Campono were at work. In the dining room were almost 100 guests. Nearly as many others were in their rooms on various floors. On the top floor were a number of servant girls, asleep.

Campono and the women rushed from the bake room yelling "Fire!" In an instant the place was in an uproar. Men and women rushed for the exits and when the fire, ascending the elevator shafts, began to pour into the corridors of the upper floors, guests faced by the smoke rushed for the fire escapes.

The moment Marshal Seyferlich arrived he ordered special alarms sent out until thirty companies were fighting the flames. Extension ladders were raised to the fire escapes and to windows to aid the women. Many of the wives of the stockmen, living in the hotel, were cut off from the stairways.

The monetary loss is placed at $200,000.

FIVE INDICTED FOR FRAUD

Julian Hawthorne, Josiah Quincy and Three Others Held for Alleged Stock Swindling.

New York.—Indictments charging conspiracy and use of the United States mails to defraud in connection with an alleged $5,000,000 swindle were returned by the federal grand jury against Julian Hawthorne, author and son of Nathaniel Hawthorne, the noted writer; Josiah Quincy, former mayor of Boston and assistant secretary of state under Cleveland; Dr William J. Morton, a specialist; Albert Freeman, a promoter, and John McKinnon of Brooklyn.

They pleaded not guilty and postponement was taken until Wednesday next. Bail was fixed at $10,000 for all except Freeman, whose bail was fixed at $25,000.

"Baby" Bliss Found Dead.

Bloomington, Ill.—Leonard Bliss, Bloomington's famous fat man, known the world over as "Baby," was found dead at his home Since the removal of his mother to a hospital for treatment recently he has been living alone. Having been missed by his neighbors, the door was forced in by the police and the dead body of Bliss was found. He was seated in a mammoth arm chair of his own manufacture, in front of a gas stove. The cocks had been accidentally turned on and death resulted from asphyxiation.

EX-MAYOR IS ACCUSED

BURNS SAYS BOOKWALTER KNEW OF M'NAMARA'S GUILT.

Dropped Dynamiting Inquiry and Was Admitted Into Labor Printing Partnership.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Former Mayor Charles A. Bookwalter, who, it is claimed, had sufficient evidence in his possession two years ago that indicated that Bridge and Structural Iron Workers' officials had caused dynamite explosions in this city, was charged with gross negligence by Detective William J. Burns in not pushing the prosecution.

Burns said the former mayor dropped the investigation and not long afterward was invited to become a member of a printing firm doing much work for national labor unions, and in which Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation, is reported to him to have been interested.

Bookwalter admitted that two years ago he had told a score of prominent national labor leaders that he was convinced of the guilt of John J. McNamara and the iron workers' union in connection with the four explosions on property of Albert Von Spreckelsen in October, 1909.

Bookwalter said he would bare all the details of the municipal investigation which satisfied him that John J. McNamara, as secretary-treasurer of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers was the conspiring executive who caused the explosions in this vicinity.

Washington. — Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, commenting upon a statement by former Mayor Bookwalter of Indianapolis, said:

"No person, living or dead, ever made such a statement to me or even gave a hint that J. J. McNamara or any one else was engaged in a dynamite plot or dynamite campaign."

ALFRED T. DICKENS EXPIRES

Son of Famous English Novelist Dies of Heart Trouble in New York Hotel.

New York.—Alfred Tennyson Dickens, son of the famous English author, Charles Dickens, and godson of the late poet laureate, Alfred Tennyson, who arrived in this country from Australia last October for a lecture tour, died suddenly here at his apartments in the Hotel Astor.

Overcome by weakness while seated in the hotel smoking room, Mr Dickens was escorted to his rooms. Doctor Burt, the house physician, quickly reached his side, but he succumbed before the physician completed his diagnosis of the attack. Afterward the doctor said death resulted from heart failure, superinduced by acute indigestion.

Aged Michigan Man Says: "Leavenworth for Me—The Sooner the Better"—Confesses Forgery.

Battle Creek, Mich.—"It's Leavenworth prison for me, and the sooner the better," said H. M. Dearing, the aged Albion banker, as he left for Detroit with his son, Palmer M. Dearing, in custody of United States Marshal Milo M. Campbell. Father and son had confessed forgeries amounting to $165,000 that resulted in the closing of the Albion National bank.

"Is there any hope for the depositors?" the elder prisoner was asked.

For an instant the man appeared on the verge of breaking down; then he choked back the tears with a great effort and replied:

"No, none at all."

The RING and the MAN
WITH SOME INCIDENTAL RELATION TO THE WOMAN
By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY
ILLUSTRATIONS By DEARBORN MELVILL
COPYRIGHT 1909 BY MOFFAT, YARD & COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

A foolish young tenderfoot becomes fascinated with the bold, artful wife of a drunken prospector in a western mining town. They prepare to elope in a blinding blizzard but are confronted by the maudlin husband. He is shot by the wife, but the chivalrous boy pins a note to the body taking the crime upon himself. In their flight to the railroad station the woman's horse falls exhausted; the youth puts her on his own and follows hanging to the stirrup strap. Seeing he is an impediment, the woman thrusts her escort into a snow drift and rides on. Half-frozen he stumbles into the railroad station just as the train bears the woman away. Twenty-five years later, this man, George Gormly, is a multi-millionaire in New York. He meets Eleanor Haldane, a beautiful and wealthy settlement worker, and co-operates with her in her work. Gormly becomes owner of a steamship line and finds himself frustrated in pier and track extension plans by grafting aldermen, backed by the Gotham Traction company. An automobile accident brings the Haldanes to his country home. Gormly announces that he will be mayor of New York and redeem the city from corruption. The political declaration of the merchant prince produced a tremendous sensation. The whole machinery of the city's detective force is to be used to dig up something damaging to Gormly. The press heretofore unanimously favorable to the merchant candidate, under pressure, divides and the campaign waxes warm. A resolution is introduced granting a gratuitous renewal of the traction franchise. Gormly offers ten million dollars for the franchise. Miss Haldane congratulates Gormly on what she terms a new Declaration of Independence, and he makes an unexpected declaration of love. He is shocked by the confirmation of his suspicions that her father is the head and backbone of the notorious traction company which he is attempting to overthrow. Young Haldane discovers his father's connection with the Gotham Traction company, and is incensed. In an interview between Gormly and Haldane the latter practically offers his daughter's hand as a bribe for Gormly to withdraw. Gormly refuses. In an interview with Gormly Miss Haldane learns of her father's baseness though Gormly vainly tries to hide it. Members of the Ring find the woman for whose sake Gormly declared himself a murderer and decide to force him to withdraw under threat of prosecution. The chief of police visits Gormly, who makes a full confession of the truth.

"Why the woman told me she threw you down herself after you gave her your horse," said the chief of police.

"Don't put that down, Chaloner. That's not necessary. Now," said Gormly quietly, "just add this:

"After a frightful experience I succeeded in reaching the station. I came to Chicago, drifted about there for awhile, and thereafter came to New York determined to retrieve the past. Whether I have done so or not it is for you, my fellow citizens, to judge. Whether this story which I relate to you now because I am compelled to do so—naturally not from choice—destroys your confidence in me and makes you believe that I am unworthy of your suffrages and thereby unfit to fill the office to which I aspire for your service, it is for you to decide. At any rate, I declare to you, what is now quite evident, that so far as I am concerned—conscious that however you may regard this solitary episode in my life, which I confess to my sorrow—I am now as confident of my competence and my integrity to do what I said I would do if you elect me as I was before the disclosure was made.

"I have informed the chief of police in closing that this statement is to be sent to every paper in the city. He and those associated with him who authorized this blackmailing proposition—and I point out that the fact that they made it is evidence of their quality—may do whatever they please in the premises. It only remains to add that in the west for some boyish whim I went under the name of George Fordyce. The last is my middle name, and I sign this statement therefore

"GEORGE FORDYCE GORMLY."

"Why, you infernal fool!" roared the chief, "you're not going to give the whole thing away like that?"

"Mr. Connell, that statement goes out, and by the hands of Somes, to every paper in New York as quickly as it can be typewritten. Mr. Chaloner, will you please make the very best speed possible to you?"

"Yes, sir."

"It won't serve your purpose," blustered the officer. "In the first place I can deny my part of it—I do deny it! You hear me, you short-hand man, before you go, and you, you English whelp! I say it's a damned lie! I never made any such proposition to him. It's just one of his grandstand plays."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Somes, addressing his master, "but I can testify that he did make such a proposition."

"How can you testify?" asked Gormly.

"I listened, sir, at the door; my ear to the keyhole."

"You hound!" cried the officer.

"I don't generally resort to that practise, Mr. Gormly, as you know, sir," pleaded Somes.

"I believe you, Somes."

"But in this instance I did it because I knew the man was up to mischief, and I thought you might want a witness, sir. You know I am sufficiently devoted to your interests to have kept silent, if you had wished me, sir."

"Your statement is of the utmost value," said Gormly, smiling. "It will be entirely useless in the face of this proof for the chief of police to deny that he came here and for what purpose. You see there is my word, the word of Somes yonder, the corroborative evidence of Mr. Chaloner that you were here."

"And what about my word?"

"Well, if you say you weren't here," said Gormly, coolly, "that'll be about the strongest evidence that could be presented that you were."

"I'll swear that it's a damned conspiracy; that you inveigled me here, knowing that this was going to be made public, and turned it to your advantage in this way."

"You can swear anything you like."

"I'll take oath to what I said, sir," interposed Somes.

"Good," said Gormly. "Mr. Chaloner, I believe you are a notary public?"

"Yes," said Mr. Chaloner, looking up from the typewriter, which he was clicking busily.

"Will you kindly administer an oath to Mr. Somes here."

It was the first time that Gormly had ever dignified his valet with such a title, and the man's face gleamed with pleasure.

Chaloner picked up his pencil. "What is the oath?"

"Allow me to dictate it," said Gormly.

"I, William Somes, do solemnly swear that at half after eleven o'clock tonight I admitted to the apartments of Mr. George Gormly, in whose employ I am, one Ben Connell, to me known to be the chief of police of the city of New York; that on receiving permission, I ushered said Connell into the library, where he had an interview with the said George Gormly; that from my position outside in the hall I heard every word of said interview; that it took place exactly as it is described in the statement of said George Gormly; that the chief of police did offer to suppress the story if said Gormly would withdraw from the campaign."

"That covers it, I think."

"Yes, sir. Exactly, sir," was the answer.

"Add:

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, Philip Chaloner, notary public, and so on."

"Now, Mr. Connell, have you any other move to make?"

"You'll find yourself arrested for murder by your own confession in the morning," said the chief.

"That may be," answered Gormly, "although I hardly think so. There are probably cooler heads and wiser than yours in the ring which I am fighting, and I scarcely think they will desire to proceed to that extremity."

"I will see the district attorney at once."

"Do so, and ask him at the same time his opinion of your own course—whether as an officer of the law you have been criminally culpable in your action—and tell him that as soon as it is daylight, information, official and formal, shall be laid before him, and that you will be impeached, indicted, dismissed, imprisoned. And this whether I am elected or not."

At this moment there was a ring at the door of the apartment. The electric bell had been ringing before, but no one had noticed it.

"See who it is, Somes," said Gormly. "And as for you, keep silent."

In a moment the Englishman came back, followed by Livingstone Haldane in a great state of excitement.

"Mr. Gormly," he cried as he burst into the room, not seeing the chief, who sat on the other side of the open door and somewhat sheltered by it, "they are going to do you up! They have unearthed some cock-and-bull story and are going to force you out of the campaign. My father gave it away to me tonight. He said you would be out of it in the morning, and—"

"This," said Gormly coolly to the chief, "is confirmation of your plan, if we needed it."

"What!" exclaimed Livingstone Haldane, observing for the first time the other man. "Are you here?"

"I'm goin' now," answered the chief, rising.

"Before you go, remember that here is another witness that you were here," said Gormly, pointing to young Haldane.

"So he's been here with his dirty story, has he?" growled the young man.

"He has."

"And what have you done?"

"Chaloner is preparing a statement that I have issued for the press."

"Be warned by me, Mr. Gormly," said the chief, his voice a singular mixture of entreaty and bullying, "don't send that fool stuff to the papers. Perhaps we can deal on some other basis. If we let you get the election and keep quiet about this thing, maybe we can get together and—"

"Somes," said Gormly, "show this man the door, and if he opens his mouth or says another word, I give you leave to accelerate his exit in any manner you may desire."

The chief of police opened his mouth.

"Remember," said Gormly, "if he says a single word, he is in your hands."

"At my feet, sir, beg pardon, sir," returned Somes.

Without making a sound, the chief turned, and, followed closely by the valet who hung on his flanks like a bulldog, his fingers itching to grasp his collar, the officer strode from the room.

"Now, what is it all about?" asked Haldane, when the door had closed behind them.

By this time Chaloner had finished one batch of the statements. Without a word Gormly took one and handed it to the young man. He read it through with staring eyes.

"You are going to send this out?"

"Instantly."

"It's the bravest thing I ever saw done."

"It has to be," said Gormly. "What will be the result of it on the people?"

"If I can judge by myself, it will settle the question forever in your favor."

"Then you don't withdraw from me because—"

"I am not the withdrawing kind," said Haldane. "You're a man through and through. You gave me a new hold on life, a new interest. You have made something of me. I am going to stick by you to the very end. Let me get my signature on that thing. I want to testify that I saw the chief of police here, and that I know from what he said in my presence that what you say is true. They will see that the Haldanes are divided, and that those on your side are not afraid or ashamed to support you."

"I can never be grateful enough to you," said Gormly.

"Ah, Chief, Unfortunately You Were Late."

"That's all right," said the young man, walking over to where Chaloner sat and dictating a line or two to be added to the statements.

"Do you know," said Gormly, "I don't think we're out of the woods yet. I believe that blackguard is capable of surrounding the house and preventing the delivery of any of these letters to the papers."

"What good would that do him?"

"It would give him time."

"Give me what you have written," said Haldane. "My car's down below. He won't have had time to do anything yet." He picked up the chief's pistol. "Give me this, too, and if anybody stops me, it won't be a happy thing for him."

"Good," said Gormly, taking the first batch. He marked them for the most important of the morning papers. "If you can deliver these we'll chance the rest. I'll send the others out by Somes and Chaloner."

"Have you any objection," said Haldane, as he picked up the batch of papers and buttoned his coat, "to my telling Eleanor?"

"I wish you would do so. You will confer a favor on me by doing it immediately."

"I will. Jove! wasn't it lucky that I heard this from my father tonight and came down here to warn you? Goodby. We'll win yet."

He wrung the other's hand and darted from the room. As he stepped into his car a number of men turned into the street and approached the house. There were officers among them, but most of them wore plain clothes.

"Hey, stop that car!" roared a deep voice which Haldane recognized as that of Connell.

Gormly's suspicions were justified. The car had already fortunately started when one or two men leaped at him. One of them gained a footing on the car. With one hand Haldane threw on the high speed, with the other he shoved the pistol in the man's face. The man fell back. The car leaped suddenly forward. The chance was gone.

A moment after Gormly himself came out of the street door. The men were huddled in front of the apartment house. He could hear Connell cursing terribly.

"Ah, chief," said he urbanely, "unfortunately you were too late. The first batch of copies has gone by the hands of Mr. Haldane in that car. Good-night, gentlemen."

He turned and walked back to the hallway and took the elevator to his own apartment.

He had put a bold face upon the whole matter. He had taken the brave, the wise, course, which after all was the only prudent course to take. He had not weakened under the tremendous pressure of the situation for a single instant. He had borne himself with amazing coolness and courage. Yet the man was absolutely stricken to the heart. What the effect of the disclosures would be upon the campaign, how the people would receive it, whether or not he would lose their confidence, whether or not the honorable reputation he had built up by years of just and generous dealing, would vanish, he could not tell; and to be truthful, at that moment, these questions were not the chief of those which filled his heart.

He asked himself how Eleanor Haldane would receive the disclosure, and what effect it would have upon her. Although she had been overwhelmed by the revelation of her father's position, Gormly had learned from young Haldane that he had not thereby forfeited her regard.

Now what difference would this make to her? She had said several times that what she admired in him was his splendid record, his unblemished honor, his unspotted past. And now what would she think?

He might have made his defense stronger. He might have said that the woman had shot the man. He might have declared her abandonment of him in the snow storm, her leaving him to die. He might have pointed out that he had assumed the guilt to shelter her; but chivalry was strong in Gormly.

He thought a long time about the situation, plunging in deeper and deeper gloom and sadness as the hours dragged by. At last he abandoned all hope of ever winning the woman that he loved. Well, he would devote himself with more singleness of heart on that account to the interest of the people; if indeed, after this, they still thought him worthy of leadership and service.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Galluses.

It is claimed that the galluses are disappearing as a feature of the apparel. They are not artistic, and certainly not aristocratic; that is what is claimed. The idea is that if a trousers is properly cut and fitted it sets so neatly on the hips that it needs no support, and therefore the presence of suspenders indicates that the man's apparel is the work of a cheap tailor, which is certainly not aristocratic.

If suspenders are to go, there is a better reason than this, and that is in the trick of the trade that leaves a weak point in the suspenders—a place that is always breaking and annoying the wearer until his patience is gone. Then he gets a belt and goes without suspenders, out of pure disgust. He would rather hitch up his trousers than tie up his galluses.

But this article of apparel is not disappearing—not as long as ready-made clothing is the joy of most men. The suspenders necessarily go with this habit, since the kidlike adjustment about the hips is impossible.

International marriage bargains do not help Americans to understand just why Europe is entitled to value American love of money.

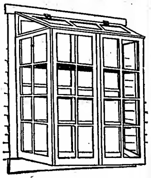
SCHEME FOR WINDOW GARDEN

Simple Little Greenhouse May Be Constructed Out of Ordinary Sash, Fastened Together.

The illustration shows a plan for a simple greenhouse or window garden. It consists of ordinary window sashes fastened together on three sides and to the sides and sill of the window, says the Prairie Farmer.

The roof is also a sash. It is loose and hinged at the top. It may be raised to any desired height serving as a ventilator to the growing plants.

On the bottom shelf is a galvanized pan, 6 inches deep. This is filled with rich soil composed of leaf-mold and highly fertilized garden soil. In this the seeds are planted; the pot plants are arranged upon the shelves.



A Simple Greenhouse.

The whole thing should be put together with some screws so that it may be taken down and stored away during the summer.

Be careful about the temperature, and remember that plants can stand a low temperature with greater fortitude than a high one. The hot, dry air in most homes is neither good for human or flower life, therefore provide ventilation to give fresh air to the home when cold weather comes.

PROPER ENRICHMENT OF SOIL

Farmers Are Realizing Necessity of Adequate Fertilization, Rotation and Thorough Tillage.

More attention must be paid to the scientific enrichment of our soil. It will not do to take everything off and put nothing back. Our farmers are realizing the necessity of proper and adequate fertilization, of proper rotation and thorough tilling their fields. In foreign countries—where more attention has been given to soil enrichment than anywhere else—it has been demonstrated that the best results are obtained by thoroughly fertilizing all the land. This can only be accomplished by broadcasting the fertilizers on the land and then working them thoroughly into the soil at the time the land is prepared for the seed. The main difficulties have been to get a machine that would scatter the fertilizers evenly over the ground, no matter what kind of a fertilizer was sown. The chief obstacle has always been the fertilizer. Some of it is pasty and sticky, other varieties are lumpy, and some like powder. The fertilizer sower to be a success must be able to successfully handle all these various commercial fertilizers.

HOW TO LIFT SMOOTH PIPE

Job Made Easy by Use of Device Shown in Illustration—How Implement Is Operated.

It is no easy job to lift vertical pipes, well-castings, etc., out of the ground, but the use of the device shown here makes it easy. Two pieces of strong spring steel (S) are welded to the end of an iron rod (R) and formed in the shape of a catch at the end.

The implement should be pushed down through the pipe (P) until the catches on the ends of the springs slip over the lower edges of the pipe. Power can now be applied to the rope or chain attached to the springs, and the pipe lifted from its place.

Profits From Diversified Farm.

It is reasonably certain that any business man who runs a diversified farm as carefully as he conducts a store can clear from $1,000 to $2,000 a year, keep up his place in proper order and have a delightful country home. He also will gain considerably in the appreciation of the land, and he has always the satisfaction of knowing that his investment is perfectly safe.

Was Testing the Baby.

Little Phil Warringer, of Addison road, was detected in the act of pulling out the baby's hair despite her frantic protest.

"I just wanted to see," he said in explanation, "whether she was cold storage baby. Teacher told us that's the way you can tell a chicken. If the feathers come out easily the chicken has been in cold storage."

Needless to say, Phil is doing penance.—New York Times.

The Better Part.

A certain woman went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and it chanced that her gown was not fully buttoned up in the back. Now, a priest and a Levite, meeting the woman and perceiving her plight, passed by on the other side, without saying a word. But a certain Samaritan, journeyed that way, was touched with compassion.

"Madam," quoth he, "your ha—hum—"

"Sir?" the woman thereupon exclaimed and gave him a look which froze him on the spot.

When it appears that discretion is the better part of valor.—Puck.

Felt He Had Known the Worst.

Pat O'Shaunessy had been told by the doctor that he could live but a few hours, and his wife and assembled relatives and friends asked him whether there was one last wish he would like to have gratified? "There is," said Pat, "I'd like to hear the village band play once again." Accordingly the village band gathered. When at last it had played, "Say Au Revoir But Not Good-by," and had taken its own departure, Mrs. O'Shaunessy, kneeling at her husband's bedside, asked: "Can ye die aisy now, Pat." "Yis," replied Pat. "I can die aisy now. Hell has nothing worse than that."

IN MATCHTOWN.

Fortunately no Faith Was Required, For She Had None.

"I had no faith whatever, but on the advice of a hale, hearty old gentleman who spoke from experience, I began to use Grape-Nuts about 2 years ago," writes an Ohio woman, who says she is 40, is known to be fair, and admits that she is growing plump on the new diet.

"I shall not try to tell you how I suffered for years from a deranged stomach that rejected almost all sorts of food, and digested what little was forced upon it only at the cost of great distress and pain.

"I was treated by many different doctors and they gave me many different medicines, and I even spent several years in exile from my home, thinking change of scene might do me good. You may judge of the gravity of my condition when I tell you I was sometimes compelled to use morphine for weeks at a time.

"For two years I have eaten Grape-Nuts food at least twice a day and I can now say that I have perfect health. I have taken no medicine in that time—Grape-Nuts has done it all. I can eat absolutely anything I wish, without stomach distress.

"I am a business woman and can walk my 2 or 3 miles a day and feel better for doing so. I have to use brains in my work, and it is remarkable how quick, alert and tireless my mental powers have become." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

The investigation made by the parties sent up to the outlet of Red Lake last week discloses a worse state of affairs than has yet been reported, regarding the log jams in the river. A full report of which will be made at, at least one of Conl. Shunk meetings next week.

Thief River Falls lumber Co. agents would like to make another report on the log jams in Red Lake River. Thanks, we have had reports enough from some state officials resideing in that city to keep the grand jury busy some time when they meet next month, as we propose to test the matter and see if a state official can make false reports to the Game and Fish Commission of this state and not be liable to prosecution. The false report sent from Thief River Falls to St. Paul August 18th, last year meant the death of every fish in Red Lake River. It was a false report and the man that made it knew it was false.

The Fish Are All Dead.

When you are wishing for wealth just wish that you had one quater of a mill for every dead fish that now lies dead on the bottom of Red Lake River between Thief River Falls and that log jam, and you could tell five of the richest men in America that you had more wealth than them all.

A fine game and fish Commission we have in this state. Do not let them tell you that they did not know about the condition of the Red Lake River last summer, for they knew all about it, as we reported to them time and again, about the time they had a farmer fined $10,00 for catching a fish up neare Bemidji, last summer

The fish in Red Lake River made a last desperate attempt to save their lives by going into the deep holes in the river, where they all smotherd and are now lieing dead on the bottom. If you think this picture is overdrawn, just go to any of the deep parts of the river and cut a hole in the ice, throw a blanket over your head and look down into the water. There you will see dead fish of all kinds of varieties and sizes, from the two foot pickerel down to the minnow piled in heaps lieing dead on the bottom of the river, and all to save a lumber company a few hundred dollars expense to open that log jam.

OLD BAVARIAN TOWNS.

Many of the Smaller Ones Merely Walled Farm Villages.

In old Bavarian districts many of the smaller towns are merely walled farm villages. These settlements of agriculturists reproduce the ancient "anger" for all. Each is built in the form of a parallelogram, the shorter sides having each a gateway, with double gates, over which rise central square watchtowers capped with conical red roofs. A narrow road or street runs from gate to gate, with old half timber houses set back close to the inclosing wall. The ground floor of these houses affords stabling for cattle, and from these stables the cows are driven out through the town gates in the morning and brought in at night. Townships like this are merely clusters of houses intimately connected with the farm lands that lie beyond their gates. The peasantry, whether peasant proprietors or allotment leaseholders, go in and out to their work.

In eastern Bavaria, toward the Danube, where the better class farms are to be seen, one finds farmhouses of wood, a great shingled roof covering—as in Holland—not only the large living apartment, with many bedrooms, but also the stables for the horses and cattle. On such farms much of the farm work is done by girls, who usually wear short petticoats, tight bodices and kerchiefs on their heads. Most of the men are either in the army or [illegible] trades.

Chinese Music.

All Chinese music is weird and screeching. They say their pleasure comes in exciting, not soothing, the nerves. They have flutes, horns, violins, mouth organs, guitars and table harps to be played with a loaded feather, which last make a delightful music akin to our mandolins. Every business house has its musical corps (just as we organize company baseball clubs), who in the evening are supposed to amuse the master, who lives on the story above the compradore's house. Seated on the counters which at night are also their beds, the forts essay with a vengeance discords which are unquestionably disturbing to the occidental nerves, but for that reason the phlegmatic Chinese find them exhilarating.—J. S. Thompson's "The Chinese."

Walter McAndress found the river frozen to the bottom yesterday when he was chopping a hole to water his stock.

Jerry O'Brien is over from Cavlier N.D. this week visiting friends and relatives and looking after his realestate interests here.

The weather has been very cold the past week but the people are not suffering for food or feed for their stock, in this neck of the woods.

Do not use Red Lake River Water. What water is now in the river is poisend from dead fish It is lots of work to melt snow for water, but it is the only way you can be safe.

Homesteaders of 1904-5, had better make application to make their final proof this month, if they want to get it compleied by March 28th,. Remember that there is no further extension of time.

We made a hard fight to try and save the fish in Red Lake River, but we lost. The lumber companys had to much money for the people to get justice. Reading of the official reports made, would make almost any one come to that conclusion.

Torjus Hanimestvet, from the town of Kratka was over from that town to day to make an application to make final proof on his homestead. Mr. Hammestvet is one of the old settlers who stayed by the country, and knew a good thing when he saw it. He now has three quaters of a section of land with fine farm buildings and can give a check on the bank for any bill he owes. Yes this farmer lives in eastern Pennington county, in the town of Kratka.

One of the men who was sent up to the outlet last week got rather a cool reception by one of the farmers over in Deer Park township, who took him for a spy of the lumber company, but as our man was looking for information and not to give any the farmer does not know yet who he was. It was not expected that the man would pass that way, or he would have been instructed to tell that farmer who he was and what his business was, and he would have been invited into the house and given a hot cup of coffee. Surely the feeling is bitter along the banks of Red Lake River against the lumber companys, at the present time.

BRETON PEASANTS.

They Always Treat a Stranger With Generous Hospitality.

In Brittany all peasants carry their own knives, and, as for forks, they have no use for them. George Wharton Edwards tells in "Brittany and the Bretons" of a visit to an inn where he met with the proverbial Breton hospitality.

An old withered Breton woman sat at the fireside busily knitting at a jersey of blue wool, and three men sat at a table playing some sort of game with dominos. The men gave no apparent heed to our entrance, but I knew we were being discussed in their patois.

We asked for bread, butter and a pitcher of cider, which was forthcoming, but no knives were brought. Noting our predicament, the three men at once produced their knives, immense horn handled affairs, and after wiping them very carefully and considerately on their coat sleeves they opened and proffered them to us.

"And now, madame," said I, "what shall I pay you?"

"Five sous for the cider, monsieur. There is no charge for the bread, for is not that the gift of bon Dieu?"

Thus it is throughout this strange land of Brittany. One may travel from end to end away from the large cities and everywhere meet with the same hospitality. The peasant will willingly share with you what he has in the cupboard and will not ask for pay.

I left an offering of silver upon the window sill among the balls of woolen yarn. I noticed that the act was not lost upon the old Bretonne, who when [illegible] eye gave me a charming [illegible] and a smiling "Merci, madame."

BOSTON HARBOR FROZE.

But That Didn't Keep the Britannia From Sailing on Time.

Boston harbor froze over in January of 1844, and the advertised sailing of the Britannia, then in dock, seemed surely to be impossible. But the merchants of Boston would not have it so. They met and voted to cut a way, at their own expense, through the ice, that the steamer might sail practically on time.

The contract for cutting the necessary channels was given to merchants engaged, like Frederick Tudor, in the export of ice, but not ice cut from the harbor. Their task was to cut within the space of three days a channel about ten miles long. For tools they had the best machinery used in cutting fresh water ice, and horsepower was employed. The ice was from six to twelve inches in thickness.

As the Advertiser of Feb. 2, 1844, described the scene: "A great many persons have been attracted to our wharfs to witness the operations and the curious spectacle of the whole harbor frozen over, and the ice has been covered by skaters, sleds and even sleighs. Tents and booths were erected upon the ice, and some parts of the harbor bore the appearance of a Russian holiday scene."

On Feb. 3 the work was done, and the Britannia, steaming slowly through the lane of open water, lined on either side by thousands of cheering spectators, made her way to the sea.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

It Has Frequently Expelled Members Legally Qualified to Sit.

The assumption made in more than one daily journal that the house of commons cannot expel a member who is "legally" qualified to sit is not warranted by precedent, the only authority to which the commons bow, says an English writer.

In the eighteenth century the south sea bubble caused many expulsions, although the members' defense had not been heard in the law courts. One of the victims was Chancellor of the Exchequer Aislabie, credited with having bagged £250,000 from the public. In addition to expulsion, he was sent to the Tower and ordered to refund his booty. An Irish peer was expelled for directing a lottery, while for organizing a "charitable association" of shady habits Sir Robert Sutton and two others were shut out in 1730. Steele of the Tatler was prohibited the house for "maliciously insinuating that the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under her majesty's administration."

But perhaps the oddest reason for shutting the doors of the house of commons upon a man is to be found in the case of Mr. Asgill, whose sin was that of writing a treatise "On the Possibility of Avoiding Death."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A LUCKY SHOT.

It Helped the Captain Out of an Embarrassing Situation.

In the good old days the revenue cutters carried small rifled cannon, but they were only used to fire salutes with and now and then break up a derelict. The gunners were never expected to hit anything. When they used the guns on floating wrecks the cutter would be alongside, and the master gunner would bang away until he'd smashed the wreck or used up his ammunition. No one ever thought of keeping tab.

Captain H. P. Berthoff told a story the other day which illustrates the conditions which formerly prevailed on the "treasury fleet." When it is a matter of running down smugglers or putting an end to poaching or mapping a bad channel or destroying derelicts the cutters average 100 per cent of efficiency.

"Few gunners could hit a target," he said. "Really there was little need. They didn't use a loaded shell once in a lifetime. But now and then the board of inspectors came on board, and then every one was worried and nervous until the ordeal was over. The inspectors visited the cutter commanded by a friend of mine. He ordered out the firing squad.

"'Bang!' went the rifle. The projectile hit the target squarely in the center.

"'Cease firing,' ordered the captain happily. And he turned to the inspectors, pleased as Punch. 'There's no use wasting ammunition,' he said. 'Our gunners can do that every time.'"—Herbert Corey in Cincinnati Times-Star.

Sorry, but He Knew It.

FitzGerald, the author, was once walking down Church street, Woodbridge, in company with a friend on the way to the Deben to go aboard his yacht. The day was hot, and he walked bareheaded and barefooted, his shoes slung by their laces across his shoulders, his clothes muddy and ill fitting. At the four cross ways, where the postoffice now stands, was gathered a party of yokels, who made the strange figure the butt for coarse wit. "Ah, bor," exclaimed one in the singsong Suffolk vernacular, "e's as mad as a hare in March." FitzGerald turned to his friend, having overheard the remark. "Yes," he said, "the fellow is right, but I'm sane enough to know that I'm mad."—T. P.'s London Magazine.

THE HUMAN BRAIN.

Scientists Claim It Is Distributed All Over the Body.

Once it was believed that the gray matter of the brain was confined within the skull. Now physicians and other students of physiology tell us that this same "gray" matter is found in other parts of the body—for instance, in the tips of the fingers of the blind, where the thinking has been consciously much exercised. One physician tells us there is little brain in the throat, and it often seems to be an independent thinking organ. An operator on the throat must become a friend and confidant of that little brain or his operation will not be successful. The little brain has a memory, and if the operator's hand has slipped and missed that throat the brain in the head may consent to the operation and desire it, but that little throat brain will resist even if it be months after the mistake, and if the operator persists the patient may be thrown into convulsions, such is the memory of that little brain.

And what has been discovered in the throat and in the finger tips will yet be discovered throughout the whole body, because we will consciously think in every part. At present much of our thinking is involuntary, not with the co-operation of the eye of central consciousness, but self knowledge brings you where you co-operate with yourself, and there are harmony and unity in all the activities of the body because of confidence throughout in the master of it.

The cells of your body can be seen as little selves or people, forming a government over which you exercise good rule by becoming acquainted with your people, educating public sentiment in noble thinking, putting away internal strife, hatred and other forms of inharmony. Certain persons suffer because they have hatred and despised parts and functions of their bodies. Hatred withers, paralyzes and congests. No one can do his best under disapproval—seek out a way to think kindly, generously, truly of yourself.—Detroit Free Press.

Churchyard Yew Trees.

One reason given why very old yew trees are so often found in country churchyards is that originally these trees were planted to supply the peasants with wood for their bows, for in lawless times it was soon discovered that the only place where trees would be safe from nightly marauders was the churchyard, where the most hardened thief dared not venture between darkness and dawn.—London Mail.

Small Girl's Pretty Answer to Stupid Question of Inquisitive Busybody.

She was a pretty little tot, and everybody who knew her took pleasure in pausing to ask her some kind of a question, merely to show an interest and for the pleasure of hearing the musical cadence of her voice. Some of the questions were what might be termed leading, but for all she invariably had some kind of an answer. Among these latter inquiries was one from an intrusive busybody, who was old enough to know better, but who belonged to a class of persons who never learn. Knowing that the little girl had only recently become the possessor of a young and attractive stepmother, with a curiosity inborn she asked her very frankly:

"Well, Pollykins, how do you like your stepmother?"

The child raised her blue eyes gravely, and with her face glowing with happiness replied:

"Oh, very much, indeed, Mrs. Skillington. We fit very nicely, considering that she got us ready made."—Judge.

PITIFUL SIGHT WITH ECZEMA

"A few days after birth we noticed an inflamed spot on our baby's hip which soon began spreading until baby was completely covered even in his eyes, ears and scalp. For eight weeks he was bandaged from head to foot. He could not have a stitch of clothing on. Our regular physician pronounced it chronic eczema. He is a very able physician and ranks with the best in this locality, nevertheless, the disease began spreading until baby was completely covered. He was losing flesh so rapidly that we became alarmed and decided to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment.

"Not until I commenced using Cuticura Soap and Ointment could we tell what he looked like, as we dared not wash him, and I had been putting one application after another on him. On removing the scale from his head the hair came off, and left him entirely bald, but since we have been using Cuticura Soap and Ointment he has as much hair as ever. Four weeks after we began to use the Cuticura Soap and Ointment he was entirely cured. I don't believe anyone could have eczema worse than our baby.

"Before we used the Cuticura Remedies we could hardly look at him, he was such a pitiful sight. He would fuss until I would treat him, they seemed to relieve him so much. Cuticura Soap and Ointment stand by themselves and the result they quickly and surely bring is their own recommendation." (Signed) Mrs. T. B. Rosser, Mill Hall, Pa., Feb. 20, 1911.

Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. 29 K, Boston.

OLD BLUE DOG'S MEDICINE

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W. A. PATTERSON

"KIOWA MEDICINE MAN MAKE DEAD ALIVE"

FORT MYER is in Virginia on a bluff overlooking the Potomac river and the Capital City of the country. The fort always is garrisoned by some picked troopers of Uncle Sam's army. Gen. Leonard Wood, the ranking officer of the service on the active list and chief of the general staff, lives at Fort Myer. Other officers of high rank have quarters there, and many an old plainsman trooper who in the old days fought the Indians, and who later fought the Filipinos, finds in the Virginia post an ideal garrison in which to round out his service.

The old soldiers at Fort Myer are as great story tellers as are the old sailors of wooden ship days who meet together occasionally at Annapolis. Stories of army life are not told alone in the enlisted men's barracks. In the officers' clubs one occasionally gets a story of the frontier days. Neither officers nor enlisted men are given to talking of their own experience, but if a tale of courage or of hardship well endured concerns another, the soldier is not slow to speak. Here is a story as told by an old officer of regulars, who is just about to leave the active service for the camp of the retired list. He called his story "Old Blue Dog's Medicine" and it ran like this:

"Ralph Burnham, government contractor doctor, joined the cantonment on the Platte river the first of July. Burnham was an ambitious young fellow, who knew his profession and he thought it was a good experience for him to go out where the Kiowas and Comanches were kicking up a row, there to do a little surgery for the soldiers.

JIM'S BODY WAS WRAPPED IN AN OLD GARRISON FLAG

"A contract doctor's pay was $1,500 a year, and Burnham concluded that he and a certain young woman down east could live comfortably enough on that amount until he chose to quit Uncle Sam's service and pick up a practice worth $15,000 a year or thereabouts. Burnham was sanguine.

"The new doctor recruit reached the cantonment about 9 o'clock in the morning. Outside the troops' quarters was a big Kiowa encampment. Burnham had never seen an Indian before, barring a few broken-spirited Oneidas on a New York reservation. He hadn't been in camp an hour before an Indian sneaked in and asked for the surgeon. It happened that the regular army surgeon had gone shooting for the morning, and the Kiowa buck was turned over to Burnham. He had 'sneaked' into the camp, because he did not want his fellow braves to know that he was a messenger after the doctor. The Kiowas believed implicitly in their own 'medicine men,' and especially in one, an ugly-faced old chap named Blue Dog.

"Burnham was told half in signs and half in words that a Kiowa buck was sick. He went along with the Indian until they reached the edge of the reds' camp. There the Kiowa pointed out a tepee as the place where the sick man lay, and then disappeared. Burnham went to the lodge and entered. He was met with growls and a frightful odor. On the ground lay a Kiowa warrior unconscious, and round him was dancing and chanting the most hideous-looking creature that Burnham had ever looked on.

"The dancer was old Blue Dog. In addition to the dancing he was burning some sort of Indian incense, which was worse than asafetida. He was trying to drive the devil of sickness out of the prostrate warrior.

"Burnham saw in an instant that the buck on the ground was suffering from epilepsy. He swung his medicine case round and began to take out some vials. Old Blue Dog gave a yell, and three bucks entered and told the doctor in pretty tough English that he couldn't try his medicine till Blue Dog got through. Blue Dog got through in ten minutes. The dancing had exhausted him, and his unconscious patient had not as much as trembled an eyelid.

"Then Burnham went at him. He had the buck on his feet inside of five minutes, and with the stimulation of the brandy that the doctor had given liberally the Kiowa acted as though he had never seen a sick day in his life.

"Blue Dog looked amazed, but he told his fellows that it was his own medicine that had brought the buck around, but that it was a little slow in acting, that was all.

"Three weeks after this Burnham was routed out of bed one night by a pounding on the window frame of his long shack. He rose and found old Blue Dog without. Blue Dog had a pretty fair smattering of English.

"'Little one sick,' he said. 'Come, same tepee.'

"Burnham followed the old medicine man, who disappeared just as the other Kiowa had done before reaching the lodge. The doctor found a child of Blue Dog suffering from a fever, tossing and moaning in delirium. Blue Dog came in. '[illegible] mustn't know,' he said, 'or they'd kill [illegible]

[illegible]m tended the child surreptitiously for a week. She recovered, and the next day Burnham found at his door, as handsome a blanket as ever a Navajo made. Blue Dog gave the blanket.

"That was the summer that the Kiowas and the Comanches went out and raided western Kansas, and Nebraska. It was one of the worst years for the settlers and the troops known to Indian warfare. Things had been quiet about the cantonment on the Platte till late in August. The garrison was ignorant that the Indians were thinking of mischief. Burnham had received word from the east that the young woman who was to be Mrs. Burnham, Helen Truxton by name, was, in response to his earnest letters, to come to the cantonment on the Platte and let the chaplain have something to do in the marrying line. Helen Truxton was an orphan and school teacher. At her lover's solicitation she left civilization behind and started for the Platte. The stage in which she was to make the last part of the journey never reached the cantonment.

"The Kiowas jumped from their Platte encampment the night before and went on the warpath. Old Blue Dog went with them, somewhat to the amazement of the soldiers. He had always been fairly friendly to the whites. Well, there were fights and skirmishes, and finally the Kiowas were pretty thoroughly smashed. The stage in which Helen Truxton had been a passenger to the Platte was found. The driver and four men passengers were dead and scalped. There was no trace of the girl.

"Those who know something of Indian warfare and savage methods can imagine the feeling that was in Ralph Burnham's heart. Four weeks had gone by and all hope of rescuing Miss Truxton alive had been given over. One morning, Blue Dog, with his wives and children, showed up on the site of the old Kiowa encampment. There he pitched his tepee. The old fellow told the commanding officer that he had been forced to go out and that he had come back to his friends, the whites, as soon as he could. The colonel knew something of Blue Dog and believed him.

"At noon that same day the old medicine man went to Burnham's quarters. 'Your medicine is strong,' he said. 'I show you mine is stronger. You raise up Kiowa brave who was dead. You cure sick papoose, but I have stronger medicine than that. You come see.'

"Burnham went along with the old fellow, not realizing what he was driving at. He reached the tepee, which was a big double affair, with the skins falling like a curtain and dividing it into two parts. Blue Dog squatted on the ground and began burning incense and chanting. Then he drew circles and danced in them. Finally he let out a terrific shriek, and, raising his arm, he said to Burnham: 'Kiowa medicine man make dead alive.'

"Blue Dog jumped backward, and in an instant the curtain of skins fell, and Burnham, with a staggered mind and blurring eyes, knew that Helen Truxton was in the tepee beyond surrounded by the wives of Blue Dog.

"Safe and unharmed she was, and saved by Blue Dog.

"Blue Dog turned to Burnham. There was a curious expression in his eye. It was as much like a twinkle as could find a place in the eye of an Indian. 'My medicine,' he said, 'raise dead, but it do more wonder than that, for palefaces and some Indians say no cure for this, but I find it,' and the chief drew in the dirt a heart broken through its center."

A sergeant with the sleeve of his blouse well covered with enlistment stripes told the other day this tale of the service:

"What's that you say?" said Sergeant Toole, as he sat down at the barracks table around which were seated a dozen comrades. "You say there never was any good in a deserter? Well, you've missed it by just one, and have made a 'four' instead of a bull's-eye. Didn't you ever hear tell of Jim Benson of I Troop of the Twelfth? Jim was a deserter, so Washington people said, but Jim loved the flag.

"What made him desert? Well, what should make an old soldier desert but a woman?

"Jim was in the service twenty-five years before he struck his flag to a petticoat. Like all those fellows, when he got his he was hit so bad that none of your surgeons who are up in matters of sentiment could probe and get out the bullet, or perhaps I'd better say arrow, for that's the kind of ammunition the little chap who shot Jim uses. You see Jim was nigh onto fifty when he got his sights fixed and held on to this pretty creature with blonde hair, blue eyes and pink cheeks. It's always the way with the old fellows when they get stuck on something young. It goes hard with them. You see the girl has heard how it was that Jim had always been steady, had never seen the inside of 'the mill' except as a member of the guard, and, moreover, how he had $4,000 drawing 4 per cent with the paymaster and was sure of going out as a first sergeant in five years with forty plunks a month.

"Jim always went into a fight to win, and he got onto the track of that girl and hung to it just as he did to the Kid's trail down in the Apache country when I Troop was chasing that red devil through the Arizona hell. The girl led Jim on for a while coquettish like, just to make sure of him, I guess. I don't suppose she ever cared a rap for him.

"Well, finally we all thought that Jim had corraled her all right. It was given out that the Twelfth's chaplain was going to have a job tying the two up. None of the boys congratulated Jim too hearty, because most of them had sized the affair up right, and wouldn't have it that the girl was good enough for Jim Benson. She might be all right for a rookie, but not for an old one who had seen more campaigns than the girl had years. I ought to have told you before that this particular petticoat was visiting at the post. She came from down Iowa way somewhere.

"One night she gave it out that she was going home, and that Jim must go down there for the splicing. She cleared out, and in a few days after the old fellow gets a furlough and clears out, too, following the trail, as we heard after, way down to Iowa. Now, you must just get hold of this fact. Jim was kind of a pious chap, but he loved the flag better than any Bible that was ever printed, but for a short time that girl was above the flag. Jim was just crazy for her. The story is that she wouldn't come back and wouldn't marry him unless he quit the army then and there. Jim tried to quit through the regular red tape channels, but they wouldn't have it down in Washington.

"Jim Benson, veteran, medal of honor man, fighter in a hundred fights, lover of his flag and country, and as good a soldier as ever wore quartermaster's shoes, deserted, and deserted for a petticoat. I forgot to say that Jim got his wad of money from the paymaster before his leave was up.

"There was another desertion inside of a month after Jim quit the colors. This time a woman did the deserting, though a fellow helped her to do it, and along with the woman and the fellow went Jim's money.

"Jim's heart was clean broke. He got in communication with his old captain somehow, and he tried to work the thing through the department for Jim, but there'd been a heap of desertions about that time, and despite Jim's medal and his twenty-five years with nary a 'blind' nor a day in the 'mill' against him, the honorable the secretary of war said that if Jim was caught he must take his medicine.

"It was rumored around old Fort Johnson that Jim had been seen on the edge of the woods looking at the old piece and seeming kind of wild like. One night one of the old quartermaster shacks got on fire. It was just before target practice season and the building had a dozen big boxes of ammunition in it. There was a pretty stiff wind blowing and it looked as if the barracks and a lot of other things would go. If that stuff had exploded the other buildings would have gone sure. The fire was fairly eating around those boxes and the fellows fought shy of it.

"All at once, while the crowd was bearing back, somebody jumped clean through the line and plump into the fire. He grabbed a box and threw it out clear of the blaze, and then another and another, though the flames were burning his clothes and going up wreathlike about his head.

"When he had done the business clean and good, the man jumped out of the flames and ran to the woods. Well I guess you know who it was. It was Jim Benson. We found him dead the next day in the thicket, but the curious part of the matter was that Jim's body was wrapped in an old garrison flag that had been pinned about him by the last effort of those poor burned hands. Jim thought, you see, that deserter though he was, if he did this that they might bury him with the flag.

"Did they do it? Yes, and gave him the regulation three rounds over the grave and the best prayer that the old chaplain knew how to pray."

$3.50 Recipe Free, For Weak Kidneys.

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, Etc.

Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say good-bye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K-2068 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

A COLD DINNER.

Mrs. Benham—I see that they have found the North Pole.

Benham—That's no reason why you should do your cooking there.

Cornered.

Lord Guilford tells a story of a young lady's resources at a bazaar. Business was in full swing when a young man strolled around the various stalls, with no intention of purchasing anything. As he passed a large, beautifully decorated stall the young lady seller detained him. "Won't you buy a cigarette holder, sir?" she asked. "No, thank you, I don't smoke," was the curt reply. "Or a pen writer worked with my own hands?" "I don't write." "Then do have this nice box of chocolates." "I don't eat sweets." The young lady's patience was exhausted. "Sir," she said grimly, "will you buy this box of soap?"

The young man paid up.

He Knew the Worm.

A country girl was home from college for the Christmas holidays and the old folks were having a reception in her honor. During the event she brought out some of her new gowns to show to the guests. Picking up a beautiful silk creation, she held it up before the admiring crowd.

"Isn't it perfectly gorgeous!" she exclaimed. "Just think, it came from a poor little insignificant worm!"

Her hard-working father looked a moment, then turned and said: "Yes, darn it, an' I'm that worm!"—Ladies' Home Journal.

Reconnoitered.

Mamma was dressing when seven-year-old Freddy burst into the room with a loud "Boo!"

"Why, Freddy, dear," expostulated she, "you mustn't open my door without knocking. I mightn't have been dressed at all."

"Oh, this was all right," said Freddy, "I looked through the keyhole first."—Judge.

DULUTH HONORS FAMOUS SON OF FAMOUS FATHER.

JAMES J. HILL, Chairman, and LOUIS W. HILL, President Great Northern Railway.

HILL CHAMPIONS NORTH STAR STATE

ADDRESSING COMMERCIAL CLUB, GREAT NORTHERN HEAD SEES GREAT RESULTS IF ALL CO-OPERATE.

Leaders of Zenith City Pay Eloquent Tribute to Guest of Honor as One Who Has Made Good.

Duluth.—State developments was the keynote of L. W. Hill's address at the Commercial club's banquet at the Spalding hotel at which he was guest of honor. The president of the Great Northern railroad held out alluring prospects of great expansion of the agricultural resources, and declared that Minnesota was just awakening to the wonderful possibilities which can be here for the effort. Mr. Hill strongly urged co-operation of the people to the end that the development of Northern Minnesota may progress more rapidly.

STATE—FOUR

Mr. Hill was received with much enthusiasm. He was acquainted with most of the 150 persons present and the function lacked much of the formality which might attach to a similar event where the guest of honor was a stranger, personally.

W. A. McGonagle, president of the Duluth, Missabe & Northern road, was toastmaster. He introduced Mr. Hill as a young man who had made good despite the fact that greatness was thrust upon him and that there was no young man in the country whose career had been watched with greater interest and ultimate satisfaction than his. Mr. Hill's talk came after the toastmaster had introduced representatives of the city, the grain business, manufacturing, navigation, etc.

Mayor Welcomes Club Guest.

Mayor M. B. Cullum and President C. A. Luster, of the Commercial club, delivered the welcoming addresses to the visitor and his party from the Twin Cities. A. D. Thomson, of Duluth, paid a fine tribute to James J. Hill and to his son. He said that while we hear so much about the wonderful resources of timber and ore, we don't hear much about wheat and wondered why. Mr. Thomson declared that the Great Northern road would be hauling wheat to the Head of the Lakes long after the ore and lumber traffic had become mere memories. F. A. Patrick, W. J. Olcott, Julius H. Barnes and other prominent Duluth men were speakers at the banquet.

When the special train bearing Hill and party arrived the party was escorted by the reception committee to the Spalding hotel, where an informal reception was held and the visitors were then entertained at the Kitchi Gammi club until the banquet hour.

EDWARD HINES NOT PURCHASER.

Claimed Rainy Lake Company Took Up Shevlin-Clark Interests.

Duluth. — The report from Winnipeg that the Edward Hines Lumber company has purchased the Shevlin-Clark sawmill and a quantity of Canadian timber is untrue, as far as the name of the purchaser is concerned and the consideration. It has been learned from other sources which are reliable that the Rainy Lake company has purchased the Shevlin-Clark mill or at least that crowd which includes Edward Hines, the Weyerhaeusers, William O'Brien and others.

The Winnipeg report gives the consideration as having been $750,000, but it was $1,500,000. The Hines-Weyer-O'Brien syndicate already own 700,000,000 feet of Canadian timber.

WOMAN'S DEATH ACCIDENTAL.

Barnesville.—In the case of Ellen Nyeng, whose body was found in her home ten miles east of here Christmas night, the coroner's jury brought in a verdict that the woman came to her death from accidental causes, either by falling or from injuries from stock in the barn on the Nyeng farm. Lander Nyeng, who was held here for twenty-four hours, was discharged.

Corn Growing Featured at Hastings.

Hastings.—Farmers of Dakota and Washington counties met at the courthouse here, the principal interest being manifested in corn raising. C. P. Bull, professor of agronomy at the state agricultural school, and Professor J. W. Jones of Boise, assistant to the immigration commissioner of Idaho were the speakers. Professor Bull discussed corn production and improvement of crop by thorough and scientific cultivation, and Professor Jones dwelt upon the improvement of corn through seed selection.

TO TEST COMMISSION PLAN.

Mankato Tax Payers Bring Suit in Supreme Court.

St. Paul.—Mankato, the largest city in Minnesota to adopt the commission form of government, was made the defendant in an action in the state supreme court to test the right of its five commissioners to continue to hold the reins of government.

The suit is brought by Attorney General Simpson at the instance of a number of taxpayers of Mankato, headed by August Blissenbach, who have agreed to pay all expenses of the suit. Mr. Simpson's petition requested the five commissioners now in charge of the city government to appear and show cause why they should continue in office.

The action as brought by Mr. Simpson is really a test of the 1909 law authorizing the commission form of municipal government and its relation to the state constitution.

Taxpayers to Stand Expense.

A test of the law was requested of Mr. Simpson some weeks ago, Minneapolis joining in the request. Mr. Simpson, however, demurred against taking the initiative unless the Mankato commission would agree to be sued. This it would not do. Several taxpayers of Mankato came forward, however, and agreed to stand sponsor for the action. They even put up a bond guaranteeing expense.

"The petition for the suit," said Mr. Simpson, "was sufficient for this office and I decided to bring the suit without delay. The right to the new form of government is a serious question and should be settled at once. Many cities and towns are interested and it is necessary to have a final determination before they can take advantage of it.

"I shall proceed on the claim that the law is unconstitutional and it is for this reason that I have asked for the writ of quo warranto. It puts the matter up to the court and will bring forth a speedy answer."

NOTICE OF DENIAL SERVED.

Striking Winona Motormen Fail in Fight Against Railway Receiver.

Winona.—Officials of the Winona Motormen's union, which is now on strike in Winona, received word of the denial by Judge Willard of the federal court at Minneapolis, of a petition asking that Receiver Howard Morris, of the Winona Railway and Light company, be required to show cause why the striking men should not be reinstated and why the new proposed working agreement should not be accepted. The court returned the petition to the local clerk and made no comment other than the serving of notice of denial. Judge Willard appointed Mr. Morris receiver some months ago.

The motormen have wired for an international officer, and further efforts will be made to win the strike. Most of the cars are now in operation under non-union local men, and no trouble has developed in more than a week.

In Fight to Curb the Power of the Money Trust.

Washington, D. C.—Representative Lindbergh of Minnesota introduced a number of amendments to his resolution calling for an investigation of the so-called money trust, the principal one of which calls upon congress to ascertain the ownership of stocks and practical control of the banks and trust companies eligible under the so-called Aldrich plan to subscribe for and hold the stock of the proposed National Reserve association so as to determine what relationship their stockholders have with the leading trusts of the country.

Another of the Lindbergh amendments calls for an investigation into the control and use of the funds and resources of the principal life insurance companies and whether they are so manipulated as to deprive policy holders of a large part of the profits justly due them.

DON'T WANT JUDGE HOOK.

Minnesota Railroad Commission Protest His Appointment.

Washington, D. C.—Because of the belief that it would be inimical to the state's interest in the Minnesota rate case to have him upon the United States Supreme Court bench the Minnesota railroad commission has wired a protest against the appointment of Judge Cather Hook to the supreme bench as it has been rumored President Taft had planned.

STATE CORN SHOW

MORE THAN 1,000 VISITORS IN THE LITTLE CITY—HOTELS ARE FILLED.

MANY FINE PREMIUMS OFFERED

Wealth of Exhibits Shown—Farmers' Short Course of Importance—Many Contests Staged.

Owatonna.—The Minnesota State Corn show was formally opened New Year's Day. The big exposition was attended by hundreds and at least a thousand visitors were in the city. The corn show is conducted under the direction of the Minnesota Corn Growers' association and is for the advancement of agricultural pursuits. Magnificent premiums were offered and a wealth of corn samples from all over the state shown.

The Owatonna armory was converted into an exposition building for this occasion and there are scores of exhibits. The floor space is one of the largest in the state. A course in grain judging is conducted by Professor Theodore Sevauer, of Albert Lea, assisted by six assistants. The rotation of crops will also be studied by this department.

Short Course for Farmers.

Of equal importance and rank with the show itself is the farmers' short course with expert teachers from the state university and other places. There is a course in animal husbandry, in charge of Professor R. K. Bliss of Iowa State college, taking up the study of horses, hogs, beef cattle, dairy cattle; a course in home economics for the ladies, in charge of Miss M. H. Olsen of Albert Lea college, taking up the study of food and dietetics, clothing, personal hygiene and home sanitation. Each of these courses runs through the week. A most important feature of the work will be the actual handling and inspection of grains and animals provided for illustrative work. Some of the principal agricultural and educational workers present are Prof. Andrew Boss, Miss Alma Campbell, county superintendent, Mower county, Prof. R. K. Bliss, F. Schilling, L. D. Harvey of Wisconsin, Mrs. Kedzie Jones, A. E. Crane, Dr. M. H. Reynolds and C. S. Cathcart. President Vincent of Minnesota university will arrive Wednesday.

A feature of the week will be a spelling contest in which the pupils of the county schools will participate for prizes of $10, $5 and $2.50.

Many special prizes are offered to add to the interest of the big corn show. There is the high school corn judging contest for a $100 silver trophy cup, at present held by the Mantorville High school. The high school winning this cup for three successive becomes its permanent possessor. There is also a high school stock judging contest for cash prizes of $25 and $10, offered by W. W. Wicoff, agricultural instructor in the Owatonna High school. Then there is a junior corn contest for the best ten ears of yellow corn exhibited by a boy or girl not more than 20 years old for a silver trophy cup valued at $50 and a cash second prize of $10. There are also domestic science department contests for the women of Minnesota. Prizes are offered for cooking and sewing as follows: For best bread made at home, for best plain layer cake, for best corn bread, for best roast, for best biscuits made in contest, for the best washing done in contest, for the best hand made garments in contest, for best and most practical kitchen apron. The prizes range from $15 to $5 for first prizes and from $5 to $3 for second prizes. Four large halls are being utilized for work of the convention.

FARMERS ENJOY SHORT COURSE.

Ninety-six Enroll at Beardsley—Women Organize a Club.

Beardsley.—A successful farmers' short course was held here. Ninety-six farmers enrolled for the work in corn judging and livestock and many women took the work offered in domestic science by Mrs. Margaret Baker of St. Paul. The ladies formed a home economics club with Mrs. J. L. Fitzgerald, president, Mrs. E. J. Daly, vice president, Mrs. A. B. Gillette, secretary, and Mrs. John McDonald, treasurer.

W. H. Tomhave, W. H. Schilling and O. M. Olson had charge of the work in livestock and K. A. Kirkpatrick and C. E. Ewen of the corn judging. Professor A. W. Rankin of the college of education and M. P. Somes gave evening lectures. The average daily attendance of farmers for the week was 150. A meat cutting demonstration and sheep butchering by Mr. Tomhave was one of the features of the week.

L. W. HILL BANQUET AT DULUTH

Duluth.—W. A. McGonagle was toastmaster at the banquet given to Louis W. Hill the evening January 3. On the list of speakers was Mr. Hill, Bishop McGolrick, F. A. Patrick, G. C. Hartley, Luther Mendenhall, W. J. Olcott, A. M. Marshall, J. L. Washburn, Joseph Cotton, Julius Barnes and Frank Kellogg B. of St. Paul. The banquet was the most representative ever held at the Head of the Lakes. One hundred and fifty were present.

HAVE YOU SUSPECTED YOUR KIDNEYS?

There are two ways to tell whether you have weak kidneys.

The first is through the pains in the back and other outward signs. The second is by examination of the kidney secretions.

That is why physicians make such a careful examination when you apply for insurance, and if there is any sign of kidney trouble you are surely rejected.

Kidney disease is so dangerous that it is a bad mistake to overlook or neglect it, and if pain in the back, recurring headaches, or a fretful, nervous, tired condition makes you suspect some kidney trouble, take the trouble to watch the kidney secretions. Look for any of the following signs:

More or less than three and one half pints passed daily.
Too dark or too pale a color.
Passages too frequent, profuse, or much reduced, or scalding and painful.
Sandy, gritty or cloudy settlings.
Fat or oily-looking layer which gathers on the surface when allowed to stand, or a jelly-like thickening.
Staining of the linen or bad odor.

Temporary changes may occur for a time from things eaten, but if the changed appearance continues, your kidneys are out of order and need help. Neglect may prove serious.

Doan's Kidney Pills correct and regulate the kidney secretions, stimulate and heal sick kidneys, and thereby drive away backache, rheumatic pain, nervousness, dizziness, bloating and other results of kidney disease.

The following case is typical of the cures effected by Doan's Kidney Pills. Grateful testimony is the best evidence.

SAVED AT THE CRISIS.

Cured After Doctors Gave Up Hope.

H. R. Hatch, 2576 Cedar Street, Everett, Washington, says: "I doubt if anyone ever suffered more than I did from kidney trouble. I endured the greatest agony anyone can imagine. My back so bad I could hardly walk. The least jar or sudden misstep caused sharp twinges through my loins that fairly made me groan. I dreaded to stoop for I knew what I had to suffer when I straightened. At times the kidney secretions passed much too freely, while again there was a marked retention. The secretions were almost like blood, offensive in odor and terribly painful in passage. I treated with several physicians and consulted two specialists in Seattle and one in Tacoma. They all told me I had Bright's disease and could expect to live only a short time. Finally I began using Doan's Kidney Pills on a friend's advice, and to my surprise, I received prompt relief. I continued and was completely cured. Though 75 years of age, I am as supple and active as any man in the country."

THE SAFE LAXATIVE FOR ELDERLY PEOPLE

Most elderly people are more or less troubled with a chronic, persistent constipation, due largely to lack of sufficient exercise. They experience difficulty in digesting even light food, with a consequent belching of stomach gases, drowsiness after eating, headache and a feeling of lassitude and general discomfort.

Doctors advise against cathartics and violent purgatives of every kind, recommending a mild, gentle laxative tonic, like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, to effect relief without disturbing the entire system.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the perfect laxative, easy in action, certain in effect and, withal, pleasant to the taste. It possesses tonic properties that strengthen the stomach, liver and bowels and is a remedy that has been for years the great standby in thousands of families, and should be in every family medicine chest. It is equally as valuable for children as for older people.

Druggists everywhere sell Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried it send your name and address to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill., and he will be very glad to send a sample bottle for trial.

A LEAKAGE THAT CAN BE EASILY STOPPED.

How many people who read this article, realize the weighty influence of one little necessity of life—baking powder—on the cost of living.

Yet it is a leakage that can easily be stopped if the housewife will only pay a little more attention to the choice of her baking powder. Some think there is economy in buying the cheap "Big Can" Baking Powders. These Baking Powders are not always uniform, and sometimes produce failures in the baking, and the result is that more is lost in one or two spoiled bakings than you spend on baking powder in the whole year. The cheap "Big Can" Baking Powders should be avoided.

On the other hand, many housewives feel that a baking powder is of no value unless they pay 50 cents a pound for it—the price charged for the high priced "Trust" brands. This is a mistake, as the best baking powder that can be made can be sold for 25c. per pound if the manufacturer is satisfied with a reasonable profit. There is one brand on the market that meets these requirements. It is CALUMET BAKING POWDER, recommended by leading physicians and chemists; used in millions of homes; and given the Highest Award at the World's Pure Food Exposition.

Uncertainties.

"A number of men who get to the front are mere accidents."

"Yes," responded Senator Sorghum; "I sometimes think that what our government most needs is some reliable form of accident insurance."

The Farmer's Son's Great Opportunity

Why wait for the old farm to become your inheritance? Begin now to prepare for your future prosperity and independence. A great opportunity awaits you in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, where you can secure a Free Homestead or buy land at reasonable prices.

Now's the Time

—not a year from now, when land will be higher. The profits secured from the abundant crops of Wheat, Oats and Barley, as well as cattle raising, are causing a steady advance in price. Government returns show that the number of settlers in Western Canada from the U. S. was 50 per cent larger in 1910 than the previous year.

Many farmers have paid for their land out of the proceeds of one crop. Free Homesteads of 160 acres and pre-emptions of 160 acres at $3.00 an acre. Fine climate, good schools, excellent railway facilities, low freight rates; wood, water and lumber easily obtained.

For pamphlet "Last Best West," particulars as to suitable location and low settlers' rate, apply to Sup't of Immigration, Ottawa, Can., or to Canadian Gov't Agent.

What Ails You?

Do you feel weak, tired, despondent, have frequent headaches, coated tongue, bitter or bad taste in morning, "heart-burn," belching of gas, acid risings in throat after eating, stomach gnaw or burn, foul breath, dizzy spells, poor or variable appetite, nausea at times and kindred symptoms?

If you have any considerable number of the above symptoms you are suffering from biliousness, torpid liver with indigestion, or dyspepsia. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is made up of the most valuable medicinal principles known to medical science for the permanent cure of such abnormal conditions. It is a most efficient liver invigorator, stomach tonic, bowel regulator and nerve strengthener.

The "Golden Medical Discovery" is not a patent medicine or secret nostrum, a full list of its ingredients being printed on its bottle-wrapper and attested under oath. A glance at these will show that it contains no alcohol, or harmful habit-forming drugs. It is a fluid extract made with pure, triple-refined glycerine, of proper strength, from the roots of native American medical, forest plants. FARMING by THE AID of ELECTRICITY

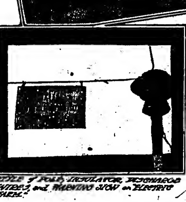
SCENE ON UNCLE SAM'S "ELECTRIC" FARM

AT WORK ON THE ELECTRIC WIRES STRUNG ABOVE THE WHEAT AREA

DR BRIGGS—UNCLE SAM'S EXPERT, TOYING WITH A CURRENT OF 100,000 VOLTS



STYLE OF POLE, INSULATOR, DISCHARGE WIRES, and WARNING SIGN on "ELECTRIC FARM."

UNCLE SAM is making a try at using the magic current to help the growth of crops. In order to test this new idea the government has recently laid out what is believed to be the first "electric farm" in the United States. It isn't a very big farm, to be sure, having, to begin with, a total area of only an acre and a half. All the same, the progress of vegetation on this little plot will be watched with keen interest, for it may point the way to helping the farmers of the future in important respects and even may be the means of making some of them independent of climate.

Of course it is not sought to convey the impression that the present undertaking by the United States department of agriculture at its most important experiment farm is the first effort to make electricity useful on the farm. Public as well as private enterprise invaded that field long ago and thus we find today many farmers in various parts of the country developing electricity for home consumption by means of power plants right on the premises, the energy for generating being supplied by the gasoline engines which are becoming so common in the rural districts, or through the harnessing of water power which has been done successfully on so many farms. Moreover, the electricity thus generated is not used merely for illumination, etc., inside the farm buildings. Progressive farmers and dairymen have adapted the twentieth century power to many tasks that had formerly to be done by human hands—as, for example, milking and churning and feed cutting.

But Uncle Sam's new venture in electric farming pursues quite a different path. This latest function of the magic current is not to supplant manual labor, but to assist nature. To particularize, in popular form, it may be explained that the idea is to have electricity supplement sunlight in its influence upon growing crops. The artificial warmth and glow will be called into play as a proxy for the burning beams from the orb above on days when there is no sunlight and in the mornings and evenings of the short winter days when old Sol is working shorter hours than in mid-summer. Perhaps electricity cannot ever be expected to prove so great a stimulus to growing plants as is powerful sunlight, but preliminary experiments have proven that it will help some and the object of Uncle Sam's present undertaking is to determine just how much assistance electricity will render under the conditions of soil and climate, etc., which confront the average American farmer.

The reader might naturally suppose, if he hasn't been informed otherwise, that if Uncle Sam was going to employ electricity to counterfeit sunbeams he would do it by calling into use powerful electric lights, which seem to be about the next best thing to sunlight in brilliancy. Well, that was the way it was done by several of the leading scientists of Europe who have rather gotten ahead of us in such tests. They hung big arc lamps in greenhouses and they lengthened the growing day for plants and vegetables by flooding the hot houses with light for several hours after sundown each day. The result was that one prominent foreigner has produced splendid strawberries in a much shorter time than would have been possible had nature been allowed to take her own course, and our own Cornell university in New York state was equally successful in hurrying the growth of lettuce, radishes and other vegetables by this same method. But Uncle Sam is not going to follow blindly in this beaten path. He is taking a new tack.

The principle of Uncle Sam's new "electric farm"—if we may call one miniature wheat field a farm—is to employ the electric current itself and not the electric lamps to spur nature in her work. This is interesting in itself and the project will be of added value in its results from the fact that the growing under electricity is to go on out of doors instead of in the artificial atmosphere of a hot house. Moreover, in order to approximate average conditions the experts of Uncle Sam's bureau of plant industry have chosen as the scene of their experiment, not a prize farm, but a tract on the largest experiment farm of the United States department of agriculture located near Arlington, Virginia. This land was formerly a part of the historic estate of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate general, but it was neglected for many years after the war and it cannot be said to offer more than average opportunities for tilling, if they be that good.

The appearance of Uncle Sam's "electric farm" is well calculated to rouse the curiosity of any chance farmer riding along the road, even if he did not see the warning signs cautioning him that he must not get within four feet of the wires carrying a current of 100,000 volts—electricity powerful enough to do all sorts of damage if given the opportunity. What the farmer beholds is a plowed area dotted at intervals of a couple of rods with slender wooden poles about seven feet in height. At one corner of the field is the so-called "power house" of this farm, a small frame building from which leads a wire connecting with the wires of a near-by interurban trolley system. If the farmer looks close he will observe that the slender posts support a perfect network of wires. Stretching from post to post are main wires, supported by huge insulators of a pattern usually seen only in the vicinity of Niagara Falls and elsewhere where high-power current is generated or transmited. Crossing these principal wires at right angles—six to the span between each two poles—are finer wires, so that, taken as a whole, there is provided a sort of wire screen suspended about the height of a man above the furrows.

Were it a case of switching on electric light when it was desired to give impetus to crops in the ground it would be apparent to the casual onlooker when the activity was in progress, but with Uncle Sam's method of administering the electric treatment things are not so obvious, hence the warning signs that hang from the wires. Nevertheless, for all that, there are no lamps the electric current is so strong that at night, the wires give off a sort of glow that is visible to any person approaching them. In daylight only a scarcely audible sound indicates the "leakage" from the electricity-laden discharge wires.

The theory which the government scientists, under the direction of Dr. Lyman J. Briggs, are trying to demonstrate is that static electricity when applied to soil and air will stimulate the growth of plants in such environment. There is ample evidence of the soundness of the theory within reasonable limits. Indeed, the benefit that may be conferred by such electric discharges is illustrated by the flourishing development (until frostbitten) of plants in the Arctic regions where there is, of course, mighty little sunlight, but where the atmosphere is heavily charged with electricity. Moreover, preliminary experiments which were recently conducted in England along the same lines that Uncle Sam is pursuing indicated that there was an increase of 30 to 40 per cent in the yield of wheat that had been thus dosed with electricity, and the wheat likewise brought a better price per bushel after a test had evidenced that it was superior for bread baking.

The officials of the department of agriculture make it very clear that their present venture in electroculture—as the new activity is termed—is purely experimental and they make no prophecies as to just what they hope to discover. The interesting point is that they are determined to find out just how much electricity will do to aid the farmer. They have made the most elaborate plans, too, for measuring the influence exerted. To this end the experimental area has been apportioned in fourteen plots of uniform size and all have been planted in the same good grade of winter wheat. Seven of the beds lie under the network of wires and thus receive the benefit of the electric discharges, while side by side with each of these electrified beds is a "check portion" or plot of equal size where no electric shower falls. By conquering the yield from the two plots in each pair and by contrasting the production by the seven pairs of beds the officials will be enabled to gauge very accurately just what influence the electrical factor exerts on the harvest. It may be added that it is not the intention at any time to keep the electric current flowing over the wire-sheltered area continuously day and night. That would be likely to do more harm than good. Late afternoons and early mornings will be chosen for giving an electric boost to the growing wheat and in no instance, probably, will Dr. Briggs have his odd cultivator at work for more than one-third of the time in any given twenty-four hours.

Gathering and Using Waste Fertility

By R. B. RUSHING.

Today the subject of procuring a supply of manure is concerning the minds of a great many farmers. This has given me much worry at times and is only mastered by hard labor and study.

Perhaps, however, I have not secured my manure all in the same way as most gardeners do. True, all farmers and gardeners cannot secure a great amount of their manure as I have secured much of mine.

In the first place I have tried to make as much manure on my farm as possible; and also tried to save as near all of it as possible. Also I have made a practice of always having some green growth to turn under at different times and derived much benefit from it.

But much of my farm fertility has come from a 25 acre wood land, which I several years ago purchased from a neighbor. This land is rough and stony.

The timber is worth very little except to keep the land shaded and shed foliage to rot. The rock on the land is of a gravelly nature and when it rains seems to dissolve somewhat and when mixed with the rich dirt and my farm soil, seems to make an ideal soil.

Here in my country there is much land that is of this type and fit for nothing practically, or at least cannot be cultivated.

I bought this piece of land ten years ago and I have hauled a great number of loads of rich dirt and sand mixed every year and I still have, it seems, as much to haul as when I first bought it.

I gave $100 for the 25 acres at first and I have received that much back every year in fertility.

However, I do not try to cover my entire farm every year, but rather select a few acres and have some green crop to turn under and apply about 20 loads of this fertility per acre, with only a few loads of barn-yard manure, say about four or five. This is not done to the land every year, that is to the same land.

I select say about five acres each year to give a renovation, apply about 100 loads of this woods' dirt and about 15 or 20 loads of barnyard manure, thoroughly incorporated with the soil and it produces good crops.

Some land of course will not need quite so much of this, but some of my land is of clay loam and in former years has not been very rich and thus it requires heavy applications to bring it up to a high producing state.

Not only in my country is it possible to have such supplies, but in many places such sources are available. The trouble is that these sources are overlooked.

I know a few farmers in my neighborhood who have bought a few cars of manure and had it shipped from Chicago, and on their farms there are waste pieces that they can get about all the fertility they need to mix with their soil.

Five years ago I bought one car myself and I must say that I have had far better results from the land that received the wood leaf mould and dirt than from the Chicago manure.

In fact, I have never used anything that gave better immediate results than does this. I have had to buy a little lime occasionally, but never had to buy nitrogen and I never expect to.

In using this in my cold frames, all the special treatment that it receives is to thoroughly work it into a good soil, or fairly good soil. As to my hot beds, I use the fire beds and apply the rich dirt for planting the seed.

While I am a great believer in buying the proper elements of plant food when it is necessary, yet I also believe in looking around and trying to find some source near home from which to supply needs and save money.

I think there should be just as great economy practiced in feeding the soil as in feeding the animals. The cost of production must be considered.

THE EVERGREENS

By R. B. BUCKHAM.

To tell something really new about the evergreens would be a difficult task indeed, since the reader has doubtless been familiar with their principal traits and characteristics since boyhood, and knows them all, root and branch. But a few facts relative to them may nevertheless prove convenient for reference, and interesting and suggestive.

First of all, then, they are distinctly desirable as shade and ornamental trees, though many fail to recognize their value as such. In time, however, they will surely come to receive the place as such which is due them.

No tree can add more to the landscape than one of these, and especially in the winter season, when so many others are leafless and forlorn. The wonder is that we do not see more of the evergreens in the streets of cities, and about fine country places.

Again, they are of prime value as timber. The price of soft wood lumber is steadily increasing, yearly. When this country was first discovered, and grants of land were given by the king, in most cases great care was taken to reserve the pine thereon to the crown. Its value was recognized then. Shall we fail to appreciate it, today?

The evergreens are all of them hardy, and easily grown, and adaptable to almost any climate and condition of soil and surroundings. You will find the spruce growing on the exposed and chilly upper slopes of mountains, and again equally well along the muddy banks of a river, or in the depths of wet and gloomy swampland, or out upon the sandy plain. Only give them a fair chance and the evergreens will look out for themselves. There is no portion of our nation in which they cannot be grown with success and to advantage. The present is always propitious with them. They care not whether times are good or bad, or what political faction is in the ascendency. They are ready to launch out with you on a venture in the lumber business at any time, and they make pretty good partners to tie up with, too.

The several varieties of the evergreens have their peculiarities, traits and habits, by means of which they can be selected to conform to one's individual circumstances. Thus, the hemlock and the larch seem to be able to endure almost any amount of moisture in the soil, whereas the pine is best constituted to thrive in the most barren sands, and to endure long continued droughts. The spruce is the most successful of them all in doing without sunshine, surviving dense shade, and making itself at home on northern mountain slopes, where the snow lingers far into the spring, and the sun makes out to shine but a little time each day.

Almost any condition of soil and situation can be met by these hardy growers, and they seldom fail to return a good profit to the man who is willing to loan them the use of his land.

If the large leaved trees retained their foliage throughout the year it is difficult to imagine what havoc wind and sleet and snow would not occasion among them; but the foliage of the evergreens is so shaped that though retained throughout the year, no damage results in the fiercest gales. What would be the destruction of other trees, but makes music among the evergreens. Long may their lyres be attuned throughout the hills and valleys of our country!

That Piano Music.

NOTED CAREER ENDS

John Bigelow, a Famous Diplomatist and Author.

Fame Won as Editor and Representative of America in France During Civil War—His Life's Span 94 Years.

New York.—John Bigelow, Sr., diplomatist and author, died at his home in this city, aged ninety-four years.

Mr. Bigelow, sometimes termed the "first gentleman of New York," was almost the last connecting link between the great men of the first half of the nineteenth century and the present day. Born at Malden, Ulster county, N. Y., in 1817, of a well-known family, he was prominently associated with the great men and the determining movements of the country during his entire life.

In 1849, at the invitation of William Cullen Bryant, Mr. Bigelow became an editor of the New York Evening Post, in which position he continued until 1860. Under his editorship the paper came to a great influence.

Sainte Beuve's critical letters were published under his supervision. Walt Whitman was a reporter and later a war correspondent under Mr. Bigelow. Artemus Ward worked for the paper at the time; and it was at this period that "Bret Harte was remarkably regular at the office on pay days."

Mr. Bigelow's series of articles on the effects of slavery in the West Indies worked up some of the feeling which made Lincoln's election possible in 1860, and at the emancipator's urging the editor went as minister to France during the troublous times of the civil war.

In France Mr. Bigelow succeeded to much the same power and position that Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson had held more than 50 years previously.

It was at this time that Mr. Bigelow discovered Franklin's "Autobiography," of which he edited the authoritative edition. Later a "Life of Benjamin Franklin" was written and edited.

JOHN BIGELOW

Mr. Bigelow was appointed an executor of the estate of Samuel J. Tilden, and in addition to his ordinary duties as an executor he undertook those of the literary administrator. Tilden's "Writings" were published and later a "Life of Samuel J. Tilden" was written.

During all this time a constant stream of magazine article, pamphlets and books were coming from the ambassador-editor. His literary activities were frequently interrupted by other political appointments and honorary positions given him, but since 1867 his main thought was given to his writings.

His "Life of William Cullen Bryant," with whom he was associated so many years, was published in 1893, and in 1908, at the age of ninety-one years, his greatest work, "Retrospections of an Active Life," was published in three volumes. Bigelow's "retrospections" covered more than half of the life of the nation.

To the very last Mr. Bigelow kept a clear head and an active mind for all the problems of the nation, "writing with the ease and the elegance of the older school and with an accuracy all his own on every subject that interests him."

Two sons of the aged author, Major John Bigelow, Jr., of the United States army, and Poultney Bigelow, the writer, have attained distinction in their respective fields. Mr. Bigelow was a trustee of the New York public library, of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and a member of many learned and honorary societies in this country and abroad.

Pastor Is Some Farmer.

Sandusky, O.—Not satisfied with the good work he is doing in saving souls, Rev. C. H. Schoepfle, of Birmingham, has set out to show the farmers of this neighborhood that his duties are not so arduous but that they give him time to work a few wonders in agriculture.

Considerable rivalry has been excited among the farmers of this neighborhood in ability to grow prodigies in the various agricultural products. It was started early this fall when Frank Knhl produced some enormous ears of corn. Others sprang up from time to time to claim recognition, but Rev. Mr. Schoepfle bided his time. The secret of his plans came to light when he drove to town with two enormous carrots, which tipped the scales at six and three-quarters pounds.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Balky Horse Blocks Cleveland Street

CLEVELAND.—An antiquated horse with a hang-dog, apologetic cast of countenance, a moth-eaten hide and the disposition of a Missouri mule, stopped on Cleveland's busiest street the other afternoon.

For twenty-five minutes the horse defied four of Chief Kohler's "finest," blocked traffic on the congested thoroughfare and kept a big crowd in an uproar.

The horse was pulling a cart which to all appearances was as antiquated as himself. A little negro topped off the outfit. When the horse stopped the negro carefully laid away his stump of a whip, extracted "the makin's" from a place of concealment in a dilapidated coat and thoughtfully began to roll a cigarette.

Just fifty seconds from the moment the horse had decided to cease movement a mounted traffic regulator arrived.

"Get a move on that nag," he shouted to the negro.

"Do it yourself, sah," responded the erstwhile driver, complacently continuing to roll the "skag."

The spick and span officer vaulted from his mount, grabbed the bridle and gave it a jerk. Then he jerked again. Then he pulled. The horse regarded him with reproachful eyes, but it didn't move.

A bicycle patrolman, a cotton-gloved traffic cop, and then another, appeared within the next five minutes. Also a crowd gathered.

"Ah might unhitch that there hoss and lead 'im away," suggested the little negro thoughtfully.

"I's 'gainst the rules to unhitch on a congested street," responded an officer curtly, "you've got to drive him."

"A'm powerfully sorry, hoss, but Ah jus' naturally can't do that," said the little negro, and started to roll another cigarette.

Traffic had congested until it threatened to block Euclid avenue also. Then the officers admitted defeat. The little negro unhitched, the officers, aided by volunteers, backed the wagon into an alley, and the horse ambled dejectedly along.

City Schools to Be Social Centers

CHICAGO.—Thirteen public school buildings will be opened to Chicago soon as neighborhood social centers. For the first time in its history the Chicago board of education will offer to persons not of common school age some of the benefits that the presence of school buildings may bring to a neighborhood. This decision was reached at a recent meeting of the board's committee on social centers.

To help the people get their money's worth out of expensive equipment used only a few hours out of the day is the object of the innovation.

"Our idea in opening these social centers," said Dean Sumner, in explaining the new policy, "is to learn if there is a demand for the use of schools by adults. If there is such a demand or if we can create it, we shall develop the centers into evening meeting places for parents' clubs, for social organizations and for civic debating societies, all under the direction of the principal of the center, who is also the principal of the school.

"Last year we conducted ten school buildings as centers for children.

"Each of the centers for the children was provided with a principal and six teachers. Parents came in swarms with their children and so they really made use of the buildings as social centers for adults before the privileges were formally given to them.

"For the children we shall continue the privilege of recreation in the old schools and in those added this year. In the same buildings the older people will be urged to form social clubs, hear lectures, attend dramatics, join in advanced gymnasium work and hear and participate in debates."

Gets Rich Selling Candy on Streets

NEW YORK.—The wind-swept corner at Broadway and Fulton street is soon to lose one of its two old outdoor merchants. Phil Roman, the rubber stamp man, contemplates a future of solitude, and the sparrows in St. Paul's churchyard one of hunger, for Adam Schmalzer, friend and mentor to Phil and chief provider to the sparrows, is going to retire.

Profits accruing from the sales of a million penny sticks of candy have made Adam financially independent after thirty years, and he has realized it suddenly.

Adam has not been "old Adam" to Phil very long. When he came to the corner in 1881 the rubber stamp man called him the "kid," for Phil then had been doing business at the old stand for something like twelve years. Adam wasn't at the corner when a reporter went to see him the other day. Phil was standing guard over both stands.

"Yes," he admitted, "Adam, he's going to quit. Thirty years I've seen him come and go. Six o'clock in the morning I'd see him come across Broadway lugging his candy case from the basement where he kept it.

"Guess there's more money in candy than there is in rubber stamps. Now Adam's to go, I'd quit, too, if I could afford it."

"My dad was the first man to sell lemonade on the streets of New York City. My grandfather was a sidewalk merchant. Maybe I've been a little luckier than they," old Adam said.

Take Revenge by Clipping Girl's Hair

OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla.—Barbara Weaver, the 15-year-old girl who was shorn of her locks as she lay asleep, lost her crown of glory because she was "stuck up." It is strongly suspected that the vandals who snipped off one of her silken braids were two boys, former playmates of hers, who resented what they regarded as her growing tendency toward aristocracy.

Little Miss Weaver is the daughter of Claude Weaver, an attorney, who is considered wealthy. Barbara Weaver had been on friendly terms with the children in the neighborhood of the family home, but is said to have gained the idea of late that her social standing did not permit of her continuing such relations. Two of her cast-off friends are believed to have adopted the "rape of the lock" idea to express their resentment of these high-flown notions.

This theory is strengthened by the fact that Cynthia Powell, a girl of Barbara's age, who attended school with her, received a "Black Hand" letter recently, threatening her with dire things unless she continued to speak to two boys of the neighborhood who are under suspicion.

Miss Weaver's hair is a beautiful auburn and was long and silky. In preparing it for the night it was her practice to arrange it in two long braids. Miss Rosabell Teder sleeps in the same room with her, and discovered on awakening that one of the beautiful braids was missing. Hastily awakening her companion, they began a search and found the braid on the floor beside the bed. Later the other braid was cut off.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

UNCLE SAM'S MAN IN CHINA

In the present critical Chinese situation it is reassuring to know that the very heart and brains of America's China policy is now on guard in the capital of that nation in the person of Edward Thomas Williams, secretary of the American legation at Pekin, and charge d'affaires during the visit home of Minister Calhoun for conference with the heads of the state department.

Mr. Williams is a specialist in the history and languages of China, and on familiar terms with its statesmen. It is common report in the inner circles of diplomacy that all the astute moves which blocked Japan and Russia in Manchuria, maintained the open-door policy of John Hay, and prevented the dismemberment of China have been of Williams' devising when he was "Chinaman" of the state department.

The famous "four-nation loan" of $50,000,000 was the cleverest bit of diplomacy that the far east has witnessed for a generation, and was only made possible through the intimate understanding of eastern conditions and finesse which Mr. Williams possessed.

Mr. Williams was born in Ohio, and served as a missionary in China for ten years, obtaining a perfect command of the language.

LOEB MAY BE CHAIRMAN

It is the generally expressed opinion among wise politicians that if President Taft is renominated as the candidate for the presidency on the Republican ticket Collector Loeb, of New York, will be chairman of the Republican National committee.

The story of the rise of William Loeb Jr., is one of hard work, an unconquerable determination to succeed, backed by a love for the political game, combined with keen insight into character.

Mr. Loeb is of German descent. The straitened financial circumstances of his parents forced him to leave school before he had finished the course and prohibited any thought of a college education. He took up the study of law, but finding that slow and unprofitable he studied stenography between times and later branched out into shorthand reporting.

From the start he was interested in politics and worked hard for his district chief.

The making of Mr. Loeb, however, occurred shortly after the election of Col. Roosevelt as governor.

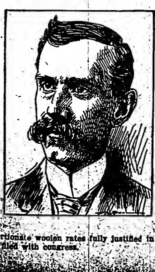
SPENDS NIGHT IN PRISON

After spending a night in prison to observe the condition of the convicts to investigate conditions there, Gov. B. W. Hooper has announced that the stripes should come off all but the worst prisoners in the spring and that thereafter the stripes should be used only as a means of punishment. As soon as the new chaplain took charge, he stated, schools would be started. As a result of his investigation he issued pardons to 25 prisoners as Christmas gifts. During the night he spent in the penitentiary he mingled with the convicts and learned from many of them the story of their lives.

"The prison," he afterward said, "is a terrible place however humane the management and conditions. Heretofore Tennessee has thought of only two things in connection with the state prison. One was to get some one into the penitentiary, and the other to get him out. It shall be my purpose to reform convicts and turn them out better citizens.

Gov. Hooper understands the under side of life. He was born in Newport and as a child was a waif on the streets of Knoxville, nameless, until Dr. L. W. Hooper took him into his home and gave him his own name.

SMOOT BACKS WOOL FIGHT



Senator Reed Smoot, of Utah, one of the most unrelenting reactionaries in public life, is to direct the administration tariff on the floor of the United States senate.

That Smoot is to be the administration spokesman in the contest over the revision of the wool schedules, around which the entire tariff discussion will center, is a matter of keen satisfaction to the woolen manufacturers of the country in general and to the directors of the so-called woolen trust in particular.

Smoot, a member of the powerful Senate Finance committee, had his training for the important part he has been designated to play during this session, under the tutelage of former Senator Nelson W. Aldrich.

The Mormon church, of which Smoot is an apostle, is understood to be interested in the manufacturing as well as the sheep raising and of the wool industry. This bill, as Washington now recognizes, was a reduction in the extortionate woolen rates fully justified in the light of the tariff board report just filed with congress.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Nation Is to Fight the Loan Sharks

I'M NOT AFRAID OF THOSE WEAPONS LOAN AGENT

WASHINGTON.—The loan shark in his arrogant disregard of human rights continues in most cities to exact unreasonable tribute from the wretched men caught in his net. Leading newspapers throughout the country have constantly denounced the business of making small loans upon the security of pledge or mortgage of personal property or assignment of wages. Drastic laws have been invoked in many states against it. Societies have been organized to protect victims from unjust practices, but the press accounts are soon forgotten by all save the unfortunate clients of the money lenders, and the campaign to remedy the conditions surrounding the business has been marked by years of fruitless struggle.

Laws are constantly and uniformly evaded, ignored and defied. The government officials and legislators have repeatedly announced their firm intention to drive the loan shark out of existence, but still this blot on our civilization remains.

The many unsuccessful attempts to legislate the usurious money lender out of existence have shown one thing very clearly, that a law that comes between the unscrupulous man who has money to lend and the man who wants to borrow cannot be enforced until an agency is established to satisfy his need at a lower cost. Recognizing this fact, philanthropic men in nearly twenty cities, content with a reasonable return upon their investment, have organized remedial societies to make loans at the lowest rates of interest practicable to deserving people upon security of personal property pledged or mortgaged.

Briefly stated, the programme of the remedial loan movement includes the organization in all cities of competitive loan societies of a social nature in the pawnbroking and chattel loan fields; the establishment of co-operative associations for savings and loans among employees, supplemented by the investment of honest capital on a reasonable money-making basis. In all states legislation will be sought chiefly to facilitate this competition.

Sent "Happy New Year" to the World

A MILLION miles of telegraph and cable wires throughout the world were thrown open to the tick of a sidereal clock in the Naval observatory on the heights overlooking Washington at the moment 1911 changed to 1912 and Uncle Sam through them called his "Happy New Year" to all the world. Every city and hamlet in the nation, the ships at sea, travelers to foreign lands were informed at the moment that the nation officially announced the arrival of Time's new span. Yet the plain-faced old timepiece merely swung its pendulum as might any such on an obscure mantel and knew not the import of the message it sent.

The tick of this clock heard as New Year's eve came to an end is the message of them all that extends furthest of all those sent since the world began. It is flashed out from the Naval observatory at Washington each year. As the seasons pass the extent of its reach is increased and that of this New Year's night was greater than any of its predecessors. It was ticked off to Nome, to Rio Janeiro, to Shanghai, to Cape of Good Hope, to London. It informed the lonely operator at a wayside station in Arizona that the New Year had arrived at Washington. It carried the message to the farming town in Iowa and to waiting thousands in Boston.

This message awakened a spark of enthusiasm in the breasts of those banished to the lonely island of Guam to learn that it was New Year back home. The men of the fleet and the ocean craft far out at sea pick up its message and rejoice.

All these wires and cables and currents of the air respond automatically to the ticking of this plain old clock at the observatory, which clock is the official standard time regulator of half the world.

Uncle Sam's Navy Holds Second Place

EXPERTS in the construction bureau of the United States navy point out the fallacy of the statement published broadcast that Germany will hold second place among the naval powers, supplanting the United States, when the ships now being built by both nations are completed. After reviewing the difference in tonnage, which is not largely in favor of Germany, a competent naval expert says:

"Taking the present and the future into consideration, the present superiority of the United States, as second in the world, continues because our superiority consists in the fact that of all ships of the same displacement we have more guns available for fighting on the broadside. The Florida, which is of about 22,000 tons, can bring to bear on the broadside ten 12-inch guns. The German dreadnoughts of the same displacement can only bring eight guns to bear.

"Now this represents the fighting value of the two navies and is actually 20 per cent in guns ahead of Germany as against Germany's ten per cent of tonnage, which really means nothing as a factor in fighting.

"Germany has not yet awakened to the fact that Great Britain began to follow us in broadside arrangements about three years ago. The kaiser's empire is still behind in the main element.

"They have only recently started to build 12-inch guns and we are building 14-inch rifles.

Old Panama Landmarks Are No More

I'LL HAVE TO HUNT A NEW PLACE

MANY villages on the Isthmus of Panama intimately associated with the history of the stirring buccaneer days are soon to disappear forever beneath the surface of the vast artificial lake which is now slowly filling up between Gatun and Matachin.

These places were known to European civilization many years before Jamestown was settled or Massachusetts Bay was an English colony. Now they are little more than jungle hamlets, and nothing of value will disappear when the rising waters of Lake Gatun blot them out of existence.

The Canal Record gives a list and short historical sketches of some of the vanishing villages. Heading the list is the old town of Gatun, which is already practically covered by eighty feet of rock, earth and water, and other places destined to disappear are Ahorca Lagarto, Barbacoas, Caimito, Matachin, Bailamonos, Santa Cruz, Cruz de Juan Galgo and Cruces.

Some of the inhabitants believe the inundation will not take place, and one old bush settler, after having ignored repeated warnings, ventured his opinion that the Lord has promised never again to flood the earth.

New rainfall records were established on the Isthmus of Panama Nov. 28 and 29, according to reports just received here. At Porto Bello about 2.46 inches of rain fell in three minutes. The total for that shower was 7.60 inches.

The highest previous record was three-quarters of an inch of rain in five minutes in 1908.

Nearly.

TAFT ON ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

President Sends Another Special Message to Congress.

PLANS FOR BETTER SERVICE

Results of Commission's Inquiry Into Methods of Saving Money and Getting Better Work From Government Employes.

Washington, Jan. 17. — President Taft submitted to congress today another message, this time on economy and efficiency in the government service.

The message in part is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit for the information of the congress this report of progress made in the inquiry into the efficiency and economy of the methods of transacting public business.

Efficiency and economy in the government service have been demanded with increasing insistence for a generation. Real economy is the result of efficient organization. By perfecting the organization the same benefits may be obtained at less expense. A reduction in the total of the annual appropriations is not in itself a proof of economy, since it is often accompanied by a decrease in efficiency. The needs of the nation may demand a large increase of expenditure, yet to keep the total appropriations within the expected revenue is necessary to the maintenance of public credit.

Upon the president must rest a large share of the responsibility for the demands made upon the treasury for the current administration of the executive branch of the government. Upon the congress must rest responsibility for those grants of public funds which are made for other purposes.

Reason for the Inquiry.

Recognizing my share of responsibility for efficient and economical administration, I have endeavored during the past two years, with the assistance of heads of departments, to secure the best results. As one of the means to this end I requested a grant from congress to make my efforts more effective.

An appropriation of $100,000 was made June 25, 1910, "to enable the president to inquire into the methods of transacting the public business of the executive departments and other government establishments and to recommend to congress such legislation as may be necessary to carry into effect changes found to be desirable that cannot be accomplished by executive action alone." I have been given this fund to enable me to take action and to make specific recommendations with respect to the details of transacting the business of an organization whose activities are almost as varied as those of the entire business world. The operations of the government affect the interest of every person living within the jurisdiction of the United States. Its organization embraces stations and centers of work located in every city and in many local subdivisions of the country. Its gross expenditures amount to nearly $1,000,000,000 annually. Including the personnel of the military and naval establishments, more than 400,000 persons are required to do the work imposed by law upon the executive branch of the government.

Plan of the Work.

In accordance with my instructions, the commission on economy and efficiency, which I organized to aid me in the inquiry, has directed its efforts primarily to the formulation of concrete recommendations looking to the betterment of the fundamental conditions under which governmental operations must be carried on. With a basis thus laid, it has proceeded to the prosecution of detailed studies of individual services and classes of work, and of particular practices and methods, pushing these studies as far, and covering as many points and services, as the resources and time at its disposal have permitted.

In approaching its task it has divided the work into five fields of inquiry having to do respectively with organization, personnel, business methods, accounting and reporting, and the budget.

Organization.

I have stated that the congress, the president, and the administrative officers are attempting to discharge the duties with which they are intrusted without full information as to the agencies through which the work of the government is being performed. To provide more complete information on this point the commission has submitted to me a report on the organization of the government as it existed July 1, 1911. This report, which is transmitted herewith, shows in great detail, by means of outlines, not only the departments, commissions, bureaus and offices through which the government performs its varied activities, but also the sections, shops, field stations, etc., constituting the subordinate divisions through which the work is actually done. It shows for the services at Washington each such final unit as a laboratory, library, shop and administrative subdivision; and for the services outside of Washington each station and point at which any activity of the government is carried on.

Comprehensive Plan of Organization.

With this outline as a basis, the commission has entered upon the preparation of three series of reports. The first series deals with the manner in which the services of the government should be grouped in departments. This is a matter of fundamental importance. It is only after a satisfactory solution of this problem that many important measures of reform become possible. Only by grouping services according to their character can substantial progress be made in eliminating duplication of work and plant and proper working relations be established between services engaged in similar activities. Until the head of a department is called upon to deal exclusively with matters falling in but one or a very few distinct fields, effective supervision and control is impossible. As long as the same department embraces services so diverse in character as those of life saving and the management of public finances, standardization of accounting methods and of other business practices is exceedingly difficult of attainment.

So dependent are other reforms upon the proper grouping of services that I have instructed the commission to indicate in its report the changes which should be made in the existing organization and to proceed in the same way as would far-seeing architects or engineers in planning for the improvement and development of a great city. My desire is to secure and to furnish to the congress a scheme of organization that can be used as a basis of discussion and action for years to come.

In the past services have been created one by one as exigencies have seemed to demand, with little or no reference to any scheme of organization of the government as a whole. I am convinced that the time has come when the government should take stock of its activities and agencies and formulate a comprehensive plan with reference to which future changes may be made. The report of the commission is being prepared with this idea in mind. When completed it will be transmitted to congress. The recommendations will be of such a character that they can be acted upon one by one if they commend themselves to the congress and as action in regard to any one of them is deemed to be urgent.

Report on Particular Services.

The second and third series of reports deal, respectively, with the organization and activities of particular services, and the form of organization for the performance of particular business operations.

One of the reports of the second series is upon the revenue cutter service, which costs the government over two and a half million dollars each year. In the opinion of the commission its varied activities can be performed with equal, or greater, advantage by other services. The commission, therefore, recommends that it be abolished. It is estimated that by so doing a saving of not less than $1,000,000 a year can be made.

Another report illustrating the second series recommends that the lighthouse and life saving services be administered by a single bureau, instead of as at present by two bureaus located in different departments. These services have much in common. Geographically, they are similarly located; administratively, they have many of the same problems. It is estimated that consolidation would result in a saving of not less than $100,000 annually.

General Technical Services.

A third series of reports is being prepared on those branches of the organization which are technical in character and which exist for the service of the government as a whole—branches which have to do with such matters as public printing, heating, lighting, the making of repairs, the providing of transportation, and the compilation of statistics where mechanical equipment is essential.

Abolition of Local Offices.

Perhaps the part of the organization in which the greatest economy in public expenditure is possible is to be found in the numerous local offices of the government. In some instances the establishment and the discontinuance of these local offices are matters of administrative discretion. In other instances they are established by permanent law in such a manner that their discontinuance is beyond the power of the president or that of any executive officer. In a number of services these laws were passed nearly a century ago. Changes in economic conditions have taken place which have had the effect of rendering certain offices not only useless, but even worse than useless in that their very existence needlessly swells expenditures and complicates the administrative system.

The attention of congress has been called repeatedly to these conditions. In some instances the congress has approved recommendations for the abolition of useless positions. In other cases not only do the recommendations of the executive that useless positions be abolished remain unheeded, but laws are passed to establish new offices at places where they are not needed.

The responsibility for the maintenance of these conditions must naturally be divided between the congress and the executive. But that the executive has performed his duty when he has called the attention of the congress to the matter must also be admitted. Realizing my responsibility in the premises, I have directed the commission to prepare a report setting forth the positions in the local services of the government which may be discontinued with advantage, the saving which would result from such action and the changes in law which are necessary to carry into effect changes in organization found to be desirable. On the coming in of the report, such offices as may be found useless and can be abolished will be so treated by executive order.

In my recent message to the congress I urged consideration of the necessity of placing in the classified service all of the local officers under the departments of the treasury, the interior, postoffice, and commerce and labor.

Classification of Local Officers.

The importance of the existence of a competent and reasonably permanent civil service was not appreciated until the last quarter of the last century. At that time examinations were instituted as a means of ascertaining whether candidates for appointment possessed the requisite qualifications for government positions. Since then it has come to be universally admitted that entrance to almost every subordinate position in the public service should be dependent upon the proof in some appropriate way of the ability of the appointee.

As yet, however, little if any attempt has been made by law to secure, either for the higher administrative positions in the service at Washington or for local offices, the qualifications which the incumbents of these positions must have if the business of the government is to be conducted in the most efficient and economical manner. Furthermore, in the case of many of the local officers the law positively provides that the term of office shall be of four years' duration.

The next step which must be taken is to require of heads of bureaus in the departments at Washington, and of most of the local officers under the departments, qualifications of capacity similar to those now required of certain heads of bureaus and of local officers. The extension of the merit system to these officers and a needed readjustment of salaries will have important effects in securing greater economy and efficiency.

In the first place, the possession by the incumbents of these positions of requisite qualifications must in itself promote efficiency.

In the second place, the removal of local officers from the realm of political patronage in many cases would reduce the pay roll of the field services. At the present time the incumbents of many of these positions leave the actual performance of many of their duties to deputies and assistants. The government often pays two persons for doing work that could easily be done by one. What is the loss to the government cannot be stated, but that it is very large cannot be denied, when it is remembered how numerous are the local officers in the postal, customs, internal revenue, public lands, and other field services of the government.

In the third place, so long as local officers are within the sphere of political patronage it is difficult to consider the question of the establishment or discontinuance of local offices apart from the effect upon local political situations.

Finally, the view that these various offices are to be filled as a result of political considerations has for its consequence the necessity that the president and members of congress devote to matters of patronage time which they should devote to questions of policy and administration.

The greatest economy and efficiency, and the benefits which may accrue from the president's devoting his time to the work which is most worth while, may be assured only by treating all the distinctly administrative officers in the departments at Washington and in the field in the same way as inferior officers have been treated. The time has come when all these officers should be placed in the classified service. The time has also come when those provisions of law which give to these officers a fixed term of years should be repealed. So long as a fixed term is provided by the law the question of reappointment of an officer, no matter how efficiently he may have performed his duties, will inevitably be raised periodically. So long as appointments to these offices must be confirmed by the senate, and so long as appointments to them be made every four years, just so long will it be impossible to provide a force of employes with a reasonably permanent tenure who are qualified by reason of education and training to do the best work.

Superannuation.

Attention has been directed in recent years to the need of a suitable plan of retiring the superannuated employes in the executive civil service. In the belief that it is desirable that any steps toward the establishment of such a plan shall be taken with caution, I instructed the commission to make an inquiry first into the conditions at Washington. This inquiry has been directed to the ascertainment of the extent to which superannuation now exists and to the consideration of the availability of the various plans which either have been proposed for adoption in this country or have actually been adopted in other countries. I shall submit, in the near future, for the consideration of the congress a plan for the retirement of aged employes in the civil service which will safeguard the interests of the government and at the same time make reasonable provision for the needs of those who have given the best part of their lives to the service of the state.

Efficiency of Personnel.

I have caused inquiry to be made into the character of the appointees from the point of view of efficiency and competence which has resulted from present methods of appointment; into the present relation of compensation to the character of work done; into the existing methods of promotion and the keeping of efficiency records in the various departments; and into the conditions of work in government offices. This inquiry will help to determine to what extent conditions of work are uniform in the different departments and how far uniformity in such conditions will tend to improve the service. I have felt that satisfaction with the conditions in which they worked was a necessary prerequisite to an efficient personnel, and that satisfaction was not to be expected where conditions in one department were less favorable than in another.

This inquiry has not been completed. When it has been ascertained that evils exist which can be remedied through the exercise of the powers now vested in the president, I shall endeavor to remedy those evils. Where that is not the case, I shall present for the consideration of the congress plans which, I believe, will be followed by great improvement in the service.

Business Methods.

In every case where technical processes have been studied it has been demonstrated beyond question that large economies may be effected. The subjects first approached were those which lie close to each administrator, viz, office practices. An illustration of the possibilities within this field may be found in the results of the inquiry into the methods of handling and filing correspondence. Every office in the government has reported its methods to the commission. These reports brought to light the fact that present methods were quite in the reverse of uniform. Some offices follow the practice of briefing all correspondence; some do not. Some have flat files; others fold all papers before filing. Some use press copies; others retain only carbon copies.

Unnecessary Cost of Handling and Filing Correspondence.

The reports also show not only a very wide range in the methods of doing this comparatively simple part of the government business, but an extraordinary range in cost. For the handling of incoming mail the averages of cost by departments vary from $5.84 to $84.40 per 1,000. For the handling of outgoing mail the averages by departments vary from $5.94 to $69.89 per 1,000. This does not include the cost of preparation, but is confined merely to the physical side of the work. The variations between individual offices is many times greater than that shown for averages by departments.

It is at once evident either that is is costing some of the offices too little or that others are being run at an unwarranted expense. Nor are these variations explained by differences in character of work. For example, there are two departments which handle practically the same kind of business and in very large volume. The average cost of handling incoming mail to one was found to be over six times as great as the cost of handling incoming mail to the other. Excluding the cost of preparation, the average cost per 1,000 for outgoing mail to one was nearly 50 per cent. greater than that for the other.

It has been found that differences of average cost by departments closely follow differences in method and that the greatest cost is found in the department where the method is most involved. Another fact is of interest, viz., that in the two departments above referred to, which show the lowest averages, orders have been issued which will lead to large saving without impairing efficiency. It cannot be said what the saving ultimately will be when the attention of officers in all of the departments has been focused on present methods with a view to changing them in such manner as to reduce cost to the lowest point compatible with efficient service. It, however, must be a considerable percentage of nearly $5,000,000, the total estimated cost of handling this part of the government business at Washington.

Results have already been obtained which are noteworthy. Mention has been made of the orders issued by two departments. Of these the order of one is most revolutionary in character, since it requires flat filing, where before all correspondence was folded; the doing away with letterpress copies; and the discontinuance of indorsements on slips, one of the most expensive processes and one which in the other department has been carried to very great length.

Need for Labor-Saving Office Devices.

The use of labor-saving office devices in the service has been made the subject of special inquiry. An impression prevails that the government is not making use of mechanical devices for economizing labor to the same extent as are efficiently managed private enterprises. A study has been made of the extent to which devices of this character are now being employed in the several branches of the government and the opportunities that exist for their more general use. In order to secure information as to the various kinds of labor-saving devices that are in existence and as to their adaptability to government work, an exhibition of labor-saving office appliances was held in Washington from July 6 to 15, 1911. One hundred and ten manufacturers and dealers participated, and more than 10,000 officers and employees visited the exhibition. There is no doubt that the exhibition served the purpose of bringing to the attention of officers devices which can be employed by them with advantage. The holding of this exhibition was, however, but a step preparatory to the contemplated investigation.

Unnecessary Cost of Copy Work.

The efforts of the commission resulted also in the adoption by several bureaus or departments of improved methods of doing copying. The amount of copy work heretofore done by hand each year in the many offices is estimated to aggregate several hundred thousand dollars. The commission exhibited, at its offices, appliances that were thought to be especially adapted to this kind of government work. Following these demonstrations methods of copying were introduced which have brought about a saving of over 75 per cent. in offices where used for six months. This change in one small cross-section of office practice will more than offset the whole cost of my inquiry.

Waste in the Distribution of Public Documents.

Going outside the office, one of the business processes which have been investigated is the distribution of departmental documents. This is a subject with which both the congress and administration heads are familiar. The prevailing practice in handling departmental publications is to have them manufactured at the government printing office; each job when completed is delivered to the department; here the books or pamphlets are wrapped and addressed; they are then sent to the postoffice; there they are assorted and prepared for shipment through the mails; from the postoffice they are sent to the railroad station, which is only a few steps from the government printing office, whence they started. The results of this laborious and circuitous method is to make the use of the best mechanical equipment impracticable and to waste each year not less than a quarter of a million dollars of government funds in useless handling, to say nothing of the indirect loss due to lack of proper co-ordination.

Wasteful Use of Properties and Equipment.

The use of equipment is a matter which also has been investigated. Up to the present time this investigation has been in the main confined to the subject of electric lighting. The government pays over $690,000 per year for electric current; it has made large capital outlays for wiring and fixtures. With the increasing demands in many buildings the present equipment is taxed to its limit and if the present methods are continued much of this wiring must be done over; in many places employees are working at a great physical disadvantage, due to inadequate and improper lighting, and thereby with reduced efficiency. In every place where the inquiry has been conducted it appears that there is large waste; that without the cost of rewiring, simply by giving proper attention to location of lights and the use of proper lamps and reflectors, the light efficiency at points where needed may be much increased and the cost of current reduced from 30 to 60 per cent. Other inquiries into the use which is being made of properties and equipment are contemplated which promise even larger results.

Unnecessary Cost of Insurance.

It is the policy of the government not to insure public property against fire and other losses. Question has been raised whether the government might not apply the same principle to other forms of risk, including insurance of the fidelity of officials and employees. A report is now in preparation on the subject which will show opportunities for large savings. I believe that the present expense for insuring the faithful execution of contracts, which, though paid by the contractor, is more than covered in the added price to the government, can be largely reduced without taking away any element of security.

Lack of Specifications.

The importance of establishing and maintaining standard specifications is found not only in the possibility of very materially reducing the direct cost of government trading, but also in insuring to the service materials, supplies and equipment which are better adapted to its purposes. One of the results of indefiniteness of specifications is to impose contract conditions which make it extra hazardous for persons to enter into contractual relations. This not only deprives the government of the advantage of broad competition, but causes it to pay an added margin in price to vendors who must carry the risk.

Excessive Cost of Travel.

One of the first steps taken toward constructive work was the reclassification of the expenditures for the year 1910 by objects. The foundation was thus made for the investigation of government trading practices. While it was recognized that this large field could not be covered within a year except at enormous cost, the subjects of "Transportation of persons" and "Subsistence while in travel status" were taken as concrete examples. The annual cost of travel to the government was found to be about $12,000,000. It was also found that the government employees were traveling in practically every way that was open to the public; it was further found that although the government was the largest user of transportation, it was buying railroad tickets on a less favorable basis than would be possible if the subject of traveling expenditures were systematically handled from the point of view of the government as a whole. The form of ticket most often used between such points as New York, Philadelphia and Washington was the single-trip, first-class ticket. In two departments definite tests have been made in the use of mileage books and in each practically the same result has been reported, viz., an average saving of a little over one-half of one cent per mile.

Better Methods for Purchasing.

Through a long period of years and by numerous laws and orders there has grown up a procedure governing public advertising and contracting that is more burdensome and expensive in some cases than is necessary. The procedure is not uniform in the various departments; it is not uniform in many cases for the different services in the same department. To make uniform the requirements so far as practicable will be in the interest of economy and efficiency and bring about that simplicity that will secure the largest opportunity for contractors to bid for government work, and will secure for the government the most favorable prices obtained by any purchaser.

The Budget.

The United States is the only great nation whose government is operated without a budget. This fact seems to be more striking when it is considered that budgets and budget procedures are the outgrowth of Democratic doctrines and have had an important part in the development of modern constitutional rights. The American commonwealth has suffered much from irresponsibility on the part of its governing agencies. The constitutional purpose of a budget is to make government responsive to public opinion and responsible for its acts.

The Budget as an Annual Program.

A budget should be the means for getting before the legislative branch, before the press, and before the people a definite annual program of business to be financed; it should be in the nature of a prospectus both of revenues and expenditures; it should comprehend every relation of the government to the people, whether with reference to the raising of revenues or the rendering of service.

In many foreign countries the annual budget program is discussed with special reference to the revenue to be raised, the thought being that the raising of revenue bears more direct relation to welfare than does government expenditure. Around questions of source of revenue political parties have been organized, and on such questions voters in the United States have taken sides since the first revenue law was proposed.

Public-Welfare Questions.

The principal government objects in which the people of the United States are interested include:

The national defense; the protection of persons and property; the promotion of friendly relations and the protection of American interests abroad; the regulation of commerce and industry; the promotion of agriculture, fisheries, forestry and mining; the promotion of manufacturing, commerce, and banking; the promotion of transportation and communication; the postal service, including postal savings and parcels post; the care for and utilization of the public domain; the promotion of education, art, science and recreation; the promotion of the public health; the care and education of the Indians and other wards of the nation.

These are public-welfare questions in which I assume every citizen has a vital interest. I believe that every member of congress, as an official representative of the people, each editor, as a non-official representative of public opinion, each citizen, as a beneficiary of the trust imposed on officers of the government, should be able readily to ascertain how much has been spent for each of these purposes; how much has been appropriated for the current year; how much the administration is asking for each of these purposes for the next fiscal year.

Furthermore, each person interested should have laid before him a clear, well-digested statement showing in detail whether moneys appropriated have been economically spent and whether each division or office has been efficiently run. This is the information which should be available each year in the form of a budget and in detail accounts and reports supporting the budget.

Continuance of the Commission.

I ask the continuance of this commission on economy and efficiency because of the excellent beginning which has been made toward the reorganization of the machinery of this government on business principles. I ask it because its work is entirely non-partisan in character and ought to apply to every citizen who wishes to give effectiveness to popular government, in which we feel a just pride. The work further commends itself for the reason that the cost of organization and work has been carefully considered at every point. Three months were taken in consideration of plans before the inquiry was begun; six months were then spent in preliminary investigations before the commission was organized; before March 3, 1911, when I asked for a continuation of the original appropriation for the current year, only $12,000 had been spent.

The expenditure for the inquiry during the present fiscal year is at the rate of $130,000. The mass of information which must be collected, digested and summarized pertaining to each subject of inquiry is enormous. From the results obtained it is evident that every dollar which is spent in the prosecution of the inquiry in the future will result in manifold savings. Every economy which has been or will be effected through changes in organization or method will inure to the benefit of the government and of the people in increasing measure through the years which follow. It is clearly the part of wisdom to provide for the coming year means at least equal to those available during the current year, and in my opinion the appropriation should be increased to $200,000, and an additional amount of $50,000 should be provided for the publication of those results, which will be of continuing value to officers of the government and to the people.

SYNOPSIS.

A foolish young tenderfoot becomes fascinated with the bold, artful wife of a drunken prospector in a western mining town. They prepare to elope in a blinding blizzard but are confronted by the maudlin husband. He is shot by the wife, but the chivalrous boy pins a note to the body taking the crime upon himself. In their flight to the railroad station the woman's horse falls exhausted; the youth puts her on his own and follows hanging to the stirrup strap. Seeing he is an impediment, the woman thrusts her escort into a snow drift and rides on. Half-frozen he stumbles into the railroad station just as the train bears the woman away. Twenty-five years later, this man, George Gormly, is a multi-millionaire in New York. He meets Eleanor Haldane, a beautiful and wealthy settlement worker, and co-operates with her in her work. Gormly becomes owner of a steamship line and finds himself frustrated in pier and track extension plans by grafting aldermen, backed by the Gotham Traction company. An automobile accident brings the Haldanes to his country home. Gormly announces that he will be mayor of New York and redeem the city from corruption. The political declaration of the merchant prince produced a tremendous sensation. The whole machinery of the city's detective force is to be used to dig up something damaging to Gormly. The press heretofore unanimously favorable to the merchant candidate, under pressure, divides and the campaign waxes warm. A resolution is introduced granting a gratuitous renewal of the traction franchise. Gormly offers ten million dollars for the franchise. Miss Haldane congratulates Gormly on what she terms a new Declaration of Independence, and he makes an unexpected declaration of love. He is shocked by the confirmation of his suspicions that her father is the head and backbone of the notorious traction company which he is attempting to overthrow. Young Haldane discovers his father's connection with the Gotham Traction company, and is incensed. In an interview between Gormly and Haldane the latter practically offers his daughter's hand as a bribe for Gormly to withdraw. Gormly refuses. In an interview with Gormly Miss Haldane learns of her father's baseness though Gormly vainly tries to hide it. Members of the Ring find the woman for whose sake Gormly declared himself a murderer and decide to force him to withdraw under threat of prosecution. The chief of police visits Gormly, who makes a full confession of the truth. Young Haldane runs the gauntlet of the police and carries the confession to the newspapers for publication.

CHAPTER XVII.

Colonel Bill Hamilton Plays His Lone Hand.

Young Haldane's first duty was to distribute manifestos to the newspapers as far as his copies permitted. Having discharged his errand, with the one copy which he had reserved for himself, he headed for home, hitting up a tremendous pace as he raced along the almost deserted streets.

Before he had left to warn Gormly, he had in a few hasty words given his sister an inkling of what was about to happen. He knew that she would be awaiting the result of his interview with an anxiety not to be measured. In a short time, therefore, he placed the confession in her hands. With straining eyes and throbbing heart the girl devoured the typewritten pages.

Her feelings were a singular compound of varying emotions. For one thing, there was relief that it was no worse; for another, there was admiration at the boldness and courage with which the man had grappled with a desperate situation, the dexterity and resource with which in perfect honor and dignity he had extricated himself from the dilemma in which the opposition had sought to plunge him, the magnificent audacity with which he had faced the crisis and dominated the interview; lastly, there was a keen, terrible pang of jealousy and bitterness toward that other woman. It was this last emotion that was self revealing.

Eleanor Haldane knew now that she loved this man. She realized in this unveiling of her heart that probably she had loved him all the time; that the other feelings and emotions which he had stirred in her heart and she had sought to characterize by different words were now blended into passion as great as his own.

She sat quite silently, staring at the paper, reading the lines over and over again, thinking her thoughts, until her brother, who had absented himself for a brief space, came back into the room.

"Well," he said, "what are you going to do?"

"Will you take a note to him tonight?" she asked.

"Not now," was the answer. "It's too late. I begged him to go to bed and try to get some rest. He will need all his strength tomorrow."

"But this night—"

"I don't care what it is, you can't get it to him tonight. Besides that isn't the best way."

The girl sat down at her desk, picked up a pen and drew a sheet of paper toward her. She divined what was in her brother's mind. She knew what would be the best way after all as well as he. Well, she would do it!

"What will father say?" she asked half curiously.

"He will have enough to do explaining his part in this transaction to say anything about anything else."

"You don't think that he—"

"I am sorry to say it," answered young Haldane gravely; "but it was father who gave me the clue, you know, and I am dead certain that the whole ring have put the chief of police up to his dirty work."

He turned away as he spoke and hung his head in shame. Eleanor Haldane had already gone through the fires, and to her overwrought soul it seemed that no further humiliation could be brought upon her.

"Maybe," she said at last, forcing herself to speak with trembling lips and sinking heart, "he won't care after—"

"Don't be a fool, sis!" said her brother roughly, yet not unkindly. "He cares more for you now than anything on earth except his election, and I don't know but that he would even let that slide—"

"He wouldn't!" was the answer. "That day at Louise Stewart's, father offered me to him if he would not publish that matter about the Traction company, and—"

"And he refused?"

"Yes."

"Great God! I didn't think the old man could sink so low."

"That isn't all either," she went on dreamily; "for I repeated the offer."

"What!" cried her brother.

"Yes. I asked him if I said I would marry him, whether he would stop the publication."

"And he refused you?"

"He did."

"God! that's a man if ever there was one!"

"Yes," was the answer, "and that is why I am taking this step now. If he had accepted me, I should have despised him. He would have sunk," she said bitterly, "to our family level."

"Never you mind about our level, sis," said the man gently. "There are few people on earth that are as high as your level; and if Gormly ever does get you, he'll be mighty lucky."

"Thank you," said the girl simply. "Now, I want you to help me with what I have to write."

Haldane seated himself by her side, and the two heads were soon busily bent over the desk.

"Gormly Took the Blame on Himself to Shield the Woman."

While all this was happening up town, matters were stirring down town. The editor-in-chief of The Planet, belated at a dinner, happened to come in for a final inspection just as the night editor finished reading the first copy of Gormly's communication.

"What do you think of that?" he said, tossing it over.

A few moments sufficed to put the editor, who was one of the coolest and most self contained of men, in possession of the contents. He shook his head.

"It's bad business," he remarked, handing it back.

"Will it beat him?"

"I don't know," was the answer. "I think not. If ever a man did atone for criminal folly or carelessness by his life, Gormly has. He seems to have been more sinned against than sinning, anyway. People generally like a man who tries to brace up and do the square thing, and if they had a few days to think it over, I believe it would do him more good than harm; but you see the election comes," he looked at his watch. It was after one o'clock in the morning, "tomorrow."

"Of course, we will want to say something editorially about it."

"Certainly," was the answer. "I will do it myself."

He sat down at his desk, took the paper up again, scanned it carefully. "Look here," he said. "There is something concealed about this."

"What is it?" asked the subordinate.

"Well, in the first place it doesn't say who shot the man."

"Why, he says he wrote a confession."

"Yes, I know. I believe the woman fired the shot, and that he's trying to save her! If we could only settle that question, it would be something to soften the revelation."

"By jove!" cried the night editor, "that reminds me!" He picked up the letter. "Camp Kill Devil, Wyo.! One of the cub reporters got a story the other day about some western adventures from a certain Bill Hamilton, an old Montana mine owner, and if I'm not mistaken Camp Kill Devil was mentioned."

"Where is the story?"

"I killed it."

"Where is the reporter? I hope you didn't kill him."

"No," was the answer. He tapped a bell on his desk. "Send Mr. Abbott to me if he's outside," he said to the messenger.

Fortune was in a complacent mood. Abbott had just come in from an assignment. He was preparing to go home when the summons reached him. Instantly he presented himself, nervous and trembling, and wondering what was up, before the two demi-gods who decided upon the destinies of the paper, and incidentally upon the fate of the reporters, cub and otherwise.

"Mr. Abbott," said the night editor sharply, "you brought a story in here the other day from a certain Bill Hamilton in which a Wyoming mining camp called Kill Devil, or some such name, was mentioned. Do you recall it."

"Certainly, sir."

"I killed the story," said the night editor. "It was no good. But now we want very much to get hold of the man who gave it to you. Do you know where he is to be found?"

"Yes, sir. He's staying at the Waldorf."

"Go up and get him at once!" cut in the chief curtly. "My machine is down in the street. Get him up here if you have to kidnap him. Tell him we want to see him about George Gormly. We've got a story in which we think he would be interested."

"Yes, sir," returned Abbott.

He did not wait for any further instructions. He darted out of the room and in a few moments was whirling up the avenue.

Col. Bill Hamilton had gone to bed. The office force made some demur about awakening him; but when Abbott disclosed who he was, what he represented, and what interests were involved, they sent him up. Naturally Colonel Bill was somewhat annoyed at being disturbed; but as soon as Abbott mentioned the name of Gormly he was instantly on the alert.

"What is it?" he asked, peering through the open door.

"It's about George Gormly. The editor-in-chief of The Planet is at the office. He wants to see you immediately. It's the biggest thing that has ever come off in New York. He thinks that maybe you know something about it and can throw some light on it. I have a big car down here waiting for you."

"I'll be down in a minute," came the prompt answer.

"Please hurry, Colonel Hamilton! We're holding the presses, waiting for you. Don't stop for anything."

"Set right down there, young man," said Colonel Bill, closing the door, "and see how quick one of the old die-with-their-boots-on crowd can get into his duds."

Colonel Hamilton was as good as his word. He did not wait for any undue physical adornment. In an incredibly short space of time he came out sufficiently clad for decency, and grabbing the young man by the arm he fairly ran down the corridor toward the elevator. The late diners were astonished as Colonel Bill and the young cub forced their way through the crowded hall to the automobile outside. The colonel had not forgotten the munitions of war, and he carried a tin box in his hand which he had snatched from his table as he left his bed room.

"Get us down to the office in double quick time," said the cub reporter to the chauffeur. "Never mind about fines. Bust up the machine, if necessary; but get us there! That's the old man's orders. We haven't got any time to spare," he yelled, as the big car started.

"This way, sir," said the cub reporter, piloting him into the elevator at once. "Here you are!" he exclaimed after a wild sweep upward.

He led him through a couple of doors and ushered him into a big brightly lighted room where two men sat.

"Col. Bill Hamilton, sir," said Abbott breathlessly. He almost felt like saluting and saying, "Come aboard, sir!"

"Thirty-two minutes," said the night editor, looking at his watch. "Very well done."

"Mr. Abbott, you may remain here, if you wish," said the editor to the cub. "It will be interesting for you to hear."

"Thank you, sir," said the delighted young reporter, making himself small and inconsiderable in a corner whence he could hear and see everything.

"You must excuse me," said the editor, "for having brought you down here so summarily at this hour of the night, but affairs of great moment—"

"You want to know about Gormly?"

"We do."

"Well, what is it?"

"Read this," said the editor.

Colonel Bill fished a pair of spectacles out of his side pocket and deliberately perched them astride of his nose. He read the letter through very slowly. The night editor was in a fever of impatience. Even the imperturbable editor-in-chief was considerably more agitated than usual.

The night editor groaned over the long windedness of the frontiersman.

"What's the matter, sonny?" asked Colonel Bill solicitously. "Ain't sick, are you?"

"No, no," was the answer.

"But go on, please, Colonel Hamilton," said the editor; "and will you be as explicit as possible. We are holding up the paper in the hope that you may be able to throw some light on this matter, and time is of the greatest importance."

"I see," was the reply. "Well, then, all that's written in that paper's true enough; but he ain't told all the truth."

"Would you mind telling us what has been suppressed or left out?"

"The man's wife was run away with as Gormly, or Fordyce as I knowed him, says on that night he indicates, that the woman's husband was left dyin' on the cabin floor."

"Yes."

"Nex' mornin', some of us, suspicionin' that there might've been some trouble, after the storm died out, got up a crowd and went over to the man's shack. We found him there—"

"Dead?" asked the editor.

"Not yet, but mighty nigh gone."

Colonel Bill drew from his pocket a key and unlocked the tin box. From a worn envelope he drew forth a worn piece of paper, on which was written in pencil that was very much faded, but still sufficiently legible, a brief message. Colonel Bill unfolded the paper, yellow with age, and handed it to the editor, who seized it, turned to the light, and read:

"I killed him, but it was in self defense.—Fordyce."

"That's the first bit of evidence," he said.

The editor nodded. "That settles it."

"No, it don't," was the reply. "For when we got there, as I said, he warn't dead, and we managed to revive him with a good drink of liquor, which Pete Breeden—that was his name—always would respond to," he interpolated. "And he managed to say a few words."

"What were they?"

"He said that his wife shot him and run off with Fordyce."

"Anything more?"

"Then he died."

"I see," said the editor. "Gormly took the blame upon himself to shield the woman."

"It will be Colonel Hamilton's unsupported statement against this written confession, though," interposed the night editor.

"Well, as it happens," was the reply, "the statement ain't unsupported."

"What more?" asked the editor.

"This."

Colonel Bill from the same tin box fished out another object wrapped in a piece of paper. He unrolled the paper and exhibited a flattened leaden bullet.

"This come from a thirty-two caliber revolver. Doc Johnson, who was the only medical shark we had in them days, he performed an autopsy, or somethin' like that, on the body of Breeden, and he got this from it. No man in the territory ever carried a thirty-two. Forty-five's the usual weapon for a gent out there, and this come from the woman's gun. I'd often seen her use it, and she could shoot most as straight as a man could, that woman."

What will a man give in exchange for a good reputation?

IN LESS STRENUOUS TIMES

Explanation of the Difference Between Domestic Standards Now and Those of Long Ago.

In the Woman's Home Companion there is an interesting presentation of the difference that exists between the domestic standard of young married women of today and those of the past generation. How did the women of the middle class of a generation or two ago manage when they could not keep help? Following is the answer quoted from a Companion editorial:

"They lived according to their means; they did not set up impossible standards, and they knew much less about the science of bringing up children. They had no special style to keep up; gave the children a weekly bath; kept the table set between meals; did not serve their meals in courses, but put all the food on the table at once; confined their social affairs to evening calls and parties, and church suppers, at which they wore the same black silk dress for at least two seasons; in short, every woman did only what she could, and her friends made it easier for her by doing likewise."

IN AGONY WITH ITCHING

"About four years ago I broke out with sores on my arms like boils. After two months they were all over my body, some coming, and some going away. In about six months the boils quit, but my arms, neck and body broke out with an itching, burning rash. It would burn and itch, and come out in pimples like grains of wheat. I was in a terrible condition; I could not sleep or rest. Parts of my flesh were raw, and I could scarcely bear my clothes on. I could not lie in bed in any position and rest. In about a year the sores extended down to my feet. Then I suffered agony with the burning, itching sores. I could hardly walk and for a long time I could not put on socks.

"All this time I was trying everything I could hear of, and had the skill of three doctors. They said it was eczema. I got no benefit from all this. I was nearly worn out, and had given up in despair of ever being cured when I was advised by a friend to try Cuticura Remedies. I purchased Cuticura Soap, Ointment, and Resolvent, and used exactly as directed. I used the Cuticura Remedies constantly for four months, and nothing else, and was perfectly cured. It is now a year, and I have not had the least bit since. I am ready to praise the Cuticura Remedies at any time. (Signed) E. L. Cate, Exila, Ky., Nov. 10, 1910.

Saw No Difference.

"People who seek books from the fiction section make some funny breaks," says a librarian of the Library of Congress. "I have made note of a number of these, but none of them amused me more than the request of a sour-looking spinster.

"She sternly demanded of me a copy of 'The Recollections of a Liar.' I told her that I didn't know of it, but that I could give her 'The Recollections of a Married Man.'

"'That will do,' said she acidly. 'It's practically the same thing.'"—Lippincott's.

A Fright.

"Lady," said Meandering Mike, "would you lend me a cake of soap?"

"Do you mean to tell me you want soap?"

"Yes'm. Me partner's got de hiccups an' I want to scare him."

LAW'S INJUSTICE MADE PLAIN

Farmer's Grievance Was That Story Once Accepted Should Not Remain Good.

A story is being told at the expense of an old English farmer who was recently called upon to explain why he had failed to take out a license for a favorite fox terrier dog. "'E's nobbut a puppy," the defendant remarked, in response to a question as to the animal's age. "Yes, yes! So you say. But how old is he?" "Oh, weel, I couldn' tell to a bit," was the reply. "I never was much good at remembering dates, but 'e's nobbut a puppy." On the other hand, it was maintained that the animal in question was a very, very old-fashioned puppy, and the magistrate inflicted the usual fine. Shortly afterward the farmer was met by a friend who wanted to know how he had fared at the police court. "Nobbut middlin'," was the reply. "Did they fine you?" "Yes," responded the victim; "an' 'ang me if I can understand it! Last year an' the year afore that I told the same tale about the same dog, an' it wor allus good enough afore! Who's been tamperin' wi' the law sin' last year?"

Eager to See.

"I have a poem here entitled 'Alone with Nature,'" said the sallow young men with the long hair and the frayed trousers. "It is a personal impression."

"Is it?" replied the editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, as he hastily glanced at the opening lines. "Have you ever been alone with nature?"

"I have, and, oh, it is glorious—glorious!"

"Here's a dime. Get on a trolley car and ride as far as you can. Go back to nature and spend another hour or two alone with her. You say you plucked the hazel blossoms by the stream. If you are able to find any place where you can do that let me know. I want to watch you while you do it."

Dissatisfaction.

"So you were given an interest in your employer's business?"

"Yes," replied the industrious youth; "but I made a mistake in accepting it. I had less work as a regular employe than as a minority stockholder."

When a bridge carries you safely over a bad place on the road to prosperity do not turn around and condemm it. The settlers of the eleven towns owe a debt of gratitude to the cow, who has contibuted her full share of the prosperity of this locality.

At Bay City, Mich., after Senator Robert M. LaFollette of Wisconsin had spoken there on his speaking trip just ended, a man apprached him and said:

"LaFollette, I came into this meeting hating you. I have laid awake nights hating you, I have been against you. I came into this hall for Taft, but I am going out of it to work my head off for you."—Ex.

The above is good news even if it does come from a sinner, who has just repented, but the solid vote behind LaFollet will come from the people, who have not forgot old "Reciprocity," Taft.

The Name of Arizona.

Arizona, probably Arizonac in its original form, was the native and probably Pima name of the place—of a hill, valley, stream or some other local feature—just south of the modern boundary, in the mountains still so called, on the headwaters of the stream flowing past Saric, where the famous Planchas de Plata mine was discovered in the middle of the eighteenth century, the name being first known to the Spaniards in that connection and being applied to the mining camp or real de minas. The aboriginal meaning of the term is not known. The name should probably be written and pronounced Arisona, as our English sound of z does not occur in Spanish.—H. H. Bancroft, "History of the Pacific States."

Charles Reade as He Ate.

One of the strangest men in regard to his diet was Charles Reade. Writing about his meals at the Garrick club, one of his friends placed one of his menus on record: "He took a cauliflower, flanked by a jug of cream, as first course and a great salad to follow, washed down by curious drinks of the shandy-gaff order. He would drink coffee associated with sweets, black pudding and toasted cheese to the amazement of any onlooker."

A Comfortable Roll.

There is a Philadelphia sporting man who is famous for the roll he always carries. Another man said to him one night:

"I suppose in strange hotels you always put your roll under your pillow, eh?"

"No; oh, no," said the sporting man "I couldn't sleep with my head so high."—Exchange.

Judges' Wigs.

The wig is only worn by English barristers to give them a stern, judicial appearance, and no one can say that it falls in this respect. The custom was originated by a French judge in the seventeenth century when, happening to don a marquis' wig one day he found it gave him such a stern and dignified appearance that he decided to get one for himself and wear it at all times in court. This he did, and the result was so satisfactory from a legal point of view that not only judges, but barristers also, took up the custom throughout Europe.—London Graphic.

MORBID BLUSHING.

A Terrible Affliction That May Be Helped by Convex Glasses.

The essential cause of morbid blushing is a morbid temperament, says Dr. H. Campbell, M. R. C. P., in the Practitioner. A normal person may blush, but he is not greatly disturbed by it. He may be disconcerted for the time; but, the storm over, he soon forgets all about it. The morbid blusher, on the other hand, suffers mental torture. The blush throws him into a state of panic such as in the normal person can only be excited by some desperate experience. The anguish is so great that he lives in constant dread of being exposed to the conditions which excite it. This dread colors his entire life. He wakes up with it; he falls asleep with it. It haunts his dreams.

Morbid blushing is, in truth, a terrible affliction. In its severe forms, Dr. Campbell says, it always calls up thoughts of suicide and not infrequently actually prompts it.

The female sex is more apt to blush than the male sex, although more men than women seek medical help for morbid blushing. "Those who suffer from the complaint may gain some confidence by using strong convex glasses. The artificial myopia thus induced by blurring the surroundings tends to diminish self consciousness."

In other words, distort the faces of people by means of spectacles and it will not matter to you how they look at you, for you will not notice them.

Russia's Parquetry Floors.

Most flooring put down in Russia is parquetry, and it is generally oak. Even in the unpretentious houses and flat buildings this parquetry is to be found. In some cases, of course, the finish is not as fine as in others, and in ordinary buildings the designs are not so elaborate. One of the most noticeable features of a Russian house is that rugs and carpets are used for wall decorations instead of floor coverings. Floor polishing by professionals, who come regularly once every week or ten days, is considered a part of the regular routine of running a house.—Detroit Free Press.

Craft of the Gypsies.

Gypsies introduced the practice of palmistry into England. This appears from a statute of 1531 called an "acte concerning Egypsyans," which recites that "afore this tyme dyverse and many outlandysshe People, callynge them selfes Egyptians, using no crafte nor faicte of marchaundyse, have comen into this Realme and gone from Shire to Shire and Place to Place, and used greate subtyll and crafty meanes to deceyve the people that they by palmestre could tell menne and womens fortunes, and have by crafte and subtyltie deceyved the people of their money."

The Giant Petrel.

The giant petrel of the arctic regions will feed on offal until it is so absolutely gorged as to be unable to rise off the ice in flight. Than it runs along the ice if chased, spreading its wings out as sails. Before being captured, however, the petrel will suddenly stop and disgorge a quantity of semidigested food and then go off on a run again. If overtaken a second time it will repeat the performance and when once it has got rid of its dinner flies away.

Making Up His Mind.

Deliberateness, a quality generally ascribed to the Scots, must reach a kind of quintessence among the Shetlanders, if this story from the Christian World may be held to represent them fairly:

The Rev. James Hamilton, minister of the Church of Scotland, Rodney street, Liverpool, while on holiday in Shetland had a narrow escape from drowning. Accompanied by a boy Mr. Hamilton was fishing for sea trout. when he slipped on a stone, lost his balance and, being incumbered with heavy wading boots, had great difficulty in keeping his head above water.

Finally he managed to get back to the shore, although in a very exhausted state, and said to the boy:

"I noticed that you never tried to help me."

"Na," was the response, "but I was thinkin' o't!"

BOWSER'S GIFT,

His Generosity Receives a Stunning Rebuff,

SAD STORY OF A HAT.

He Learns by Bitter Experience That No Man Can Buy Millinery For Any Woman—Mrs. Bowser's Ingratitude Wrecks His Christmas Joy.

By M. QUAD.

[Copyright, 1911, by Associated Literary Press.]

WHILE Mrs. Bowser was down in the kitchen the other afternoon giving the cook instructions as to dinner she heaved a sigh and said:

"Maggie, I have got a presentiment."

"I hope not," was the reply. "My brother Jim had one and was laid up in bed for two months with it. He walks lame yet."

"A presentiment is a feeling."

"Oh, is it?"

"You feel that something is going to happen."

"Well, if a tramp comes to the door and is sassy about it I'll take care of him."

"It isn't a tramp, Maggie. I've got a presentiment that Mr. Bowser is going to bring me home a present tonight."

"Glory to you! Will it be a sealskin coat?"

"I don't know, but I feel that whatever it is I shan't like it, and so there will be a row."

"I hope not. Mr. Bowser went away this morning singing that beautiful hymn, 'I Want to Soar Away.' A man who is thinking of soaring won't have his mind on a row."

"ISN'T IT A JIM DANDY?"

Mrs. B.'s Presentiment.

The presentiment didn't vanish, however. On the contrary, it grew stronger, and when Mr. Bowser finally appeared Mrs. Bowser was almost in a tremble. Then there was a reaction. Mr. Bowser was smiling. He gave her a kiss and then walked through into the sitting room and deposited a box on the table and jocularly said:

"On your life, no one is to put a hand on this until after dinner."

"Is it something for me?"

"Never you mind."

"I hope it isn't another fire escape."

"It won't escape if you let it alone."

"But is it a microbe killer?"

"Don't you worry about microbes. No use your trying to guess what it is, for you couldn't in fifty years. I will say this, however—it's something for you."

"Oh, but I want to see it!"

"But you keep hands off. I'm as hungry as a wolf and want dinner."

They went down to the dining room, his arm around her and she quite forgetful of that presentiment. Mr. Bowser was fairly jolly during the meal, and the cat sat with solemn countenance and seemed to be saying to herself:

"Oh, yes—oh, yes—but you just wait and see how this thing comes out! There's lots of time yet for a row."

When the sitting room was reached again Mrs. Bowser said:

"It was awfully kind and thoughtful of you, Mr. Bowser. How nice to surprise me with a new wrap! Just let me see one little corner of it."

The Revelation.

"Not a hair's breadth—not yet!" he replied as he seized her and went waltzing around the room and uttering chuckles. "It isn't quite a wrap, but nevertheless I hope it will prove a glad surprise. We will now investigate the mystery of the mysterious box."

"It may be a fur coat," laughed Mrs. Bowser.

"Yes?"

"Or the latest style of muff."

"Yes?"

"Or a Paris gown."

"Yes?"

"Now I know what it is for sure. It's a nice bath robe. I told you a long time ago I needed one, and you haven't forgotten. You couldn't have pleased me more."

"Mebbe not, but I hope to," he replied as he removed string and paper. "Here we are at last. How do you like that?"

A trimmed hat was taken from the box and carefully held out on his hand. Mrs. Bowser gave one look, and the room seemed to whirl around with her.

"Isn't it a jim dandy?"

[illegible] into a dozen different places before I got suited. Doesn't she knock the socks off'n anything you ever saw in the hat line?"

Mrs. Bowser couldn't answer.

"You'd have gone down and spent ten days and tried on a thousand hats before you were suited, while it took me just seventy seconds to buy this after I saw it. What's the matter with you that you ain't dancing around and clapping your hands?"

No Enthusiasm.

"N-nothing."

"Then what are you turning all sorts of colors fur? Isn't she a beauty?"

"Yes—very nice—but"—

"But what? Here is a hat beautifully jetted, trimmed up in red lavender ties and cost me $23. What's wrong with it?"

"Why, it isn't my shape," she replied.

"Your shape? What has your shape got to do with a hat? Are you too fat or too lean?"

"I mean the brim is too wide, and I can't wear those colors with my complexion."

"Your complexion be hanged! What has your complexion got to do with a twenty-three dollar hat?"

"And those ties! Even a colored woman can't wear lavender ties. You see"—

"Yes, I see, and durn my buttons I had the milliner take off the green ties and put these on and paid her a dollar extra to make the change!"

"You are awfully good and kind, dear, but I can't wear that hat. I should look like a fright in it. You see, you"—

"I see that I am an ass, Mrs. Bowser!" he shouted as he waved the hat on high. "Here I have run my confounded legs off and paid out twenty-three big dollars, and you talk about complexion and lavender and colored women!"

The Rejection.

"But please don't be angry, Mr. Bowser. You see, no man can select a hat for a woman. There's got to be harmony between"—

"Harmony, eh?" he growled. "She's got to prance around for two weeks and try on everything she sees till she can match her eye winkers, eyebrows and bump on her nose and the pimple on her chin. That's all right. You go ahead and prance!"

"I'm awfully sorry, but Maggie has an aunt who can probably wear"—

"Not by the seven bulls of Bullyille! Am I around buying hats for my cook? Am I around buying hats for my cook's aunt? Am I trotting around for Polly and Annie and Sarah and Susie? Well, I guess not!"

"Mr. Bowser, if you would listen to me"—

"You'd tell me that it could be sent to some old woman's home. Well, it can't. It's going into the alley, and when I get another surprise for you you can look for an earthquake with it."

"But"—

"No more, Mrs. Bowser. It's all settled. The hat doesn't become you, and we'll try it on an old hen. I now go to the library. If you wish to telephone your lawyer do so. Tell him that I am willing to pay $25 a week alimony, but I shall insist on the divorce being hustled right through. And while you are about it you can speak to Maggie"—

"But Maggie has gone out."

"You can speak to Maggie, and she can speak to her aunt, and both of them can go to Jericho."

Well Rehearsed.

An amateur charity worker visiting a family in the tenement district was alarmed to see the mother dash a cup of cold water in the face of the baby she had just finished dressing.

Too polite to express her amazement, the visitor held her breath, expecting the air to be rent with screams. When none came, the child merely whimpering, she said, "Dear me, I should think he'd object more than that."

"Wouldn't ye, now?" said the fond mother admiringly. "Sure I've been practicing on him for three weeks. He won't yell when he's baptized next Sunday. He'll be used to it."—Ladies' Home Journal.

FEAT OF A MACGREGOR.

Wonderful Physical Strength That Was Used to Good Purpose.

Sir William MacGregor was the hero of such an adventure as one expects ordinarily to read about only in fiction of a certain hue.

The steamship Syria, with a lot of Indian coolies on board, struck on a rock about twelve hours from Suva, the capital of Fiji.

Dr. MacGregor, then acting colonial secretary, organized a relief expedition, clambered over a broken mast that was the only path to the emigrants and again and again returned with a man or woman on his back and sometimes a child, held by its clothes between his teeth.

A man of vast physical strength, MacGregor wanted it all for his final feat. Down below on the reef was a woman who had fallen overboard, had got at the spirits and was mad with drink. The captain of the ship and a police officer who had gone after her were being swept out to sea. MacGregor slid down a rope, caught the knot of the woman's hair in his teeth and with his hands seized the two men and dragged them both into safety. He went back to Suva in a borrowed suit of pajamas, having left all his clothes and a good deal of his skin on the coral reef.

Modest, like many heroes, MacGregor left himself out of his own report, and it was from the governor that the queen first heard the whole story.—London Graphic.

FOR INJURED WORKMEN.

If a workman in a factory in Missouri gets caught in a machine and loses an arm, he may sue for damages, hiring a lawyer on a percentage basis. In the course of years he may get a verdict, says the Kansas City Star. The money that finally comes to him is only a fraction of the amount awarded. Meanwhile the courts are clogged with personal injury cases. In the state of Washington Mr. J. A. Harzfeld, president of the public utilities commission, points out, the injured workman is at once paid a definite sum out of a fund collected by the state. He needs no lawyer. He gets all there is coming to him and he gets it without delay. That is the result of the Washington workmen's compensation act, which was signed last March. Incidentally, it is refreshing to note the opinion of the Washington supreme court in sustaining the act after the New York court of appeals had held a somewhat similar law unconstitutional. The opinion, written by Judge Fullerton, construes the New York decision and says: "Notwithstanding the decision comes from the highest court of the first state in the Union and is supported by the most persuasive argument, we have not been able to yield our consent to the views there taken."

Crusades for a natural flower come, grow, fade and depart as regularly and as sweetly as the flowers themselves. Wherefore we do not take with too great seriousness the campaign said to have been started to make the mountain laurel blossom the official emblem of these United States. But why, when we are choosing a national flower, do we not at least try to find one that has some familiar connection with our daily life? The mountain laurel campaign reminds us of the grocer who came downtown and announced that he had named his son Algernon. "Why," asked his old salesman, sadly, "why don't ye give the poor kid a name he can get work with?"

A disgusted poet is authority for the charge that if a Milton were living in Chicago today he would be a mute, inglorious one. Magazine editors, this poet claims, look on poets as space fillers and not as soul-thrillers, which, perhaps, may be ascribed to the baneful influence of a pork-packing center on real poetry.

An English minister lecturing in Philadelphia declared that no successful business man could be honest. This assertion is properly denounced as entirely too sweeping, but our British cousins are probably judging our business conditions by what we have been saying about our trusts.

New York is worried over the case of a woman who goes around proposing marriage to every man she meets. If she merely had some scheme whereby she could take his money from every man she met New York would not consider her case remarkable.

Where the Acorns Grow

By CARL JENKINS

(Copyright, 1911, by Associated Literary Press)

"Just in time for the acorns, my dear," added Miss Molly Durham to her welcome to her school chum, Miss Cathy Dalton, of the city, as the latter reached the railroad depot at Ravensrest.

"Oh, are there acorns?"

"Pecks and pecks of them—nice acorns—sweet acorns—acorns falling on your head as you kick around in the dead leaves!"

"And I never saw one, except in a picture!"

"And there's a man!"

"You can't mean it!"

"But I do. He's a young man!"

"Better and better!"

"He's a mysterious young man, with black eyes and curly hair."

"Oh, Molly! I'm so glad I came! Go on, quick!"

"I don't know his name. He appeared a week ago in a very mysterious manner."

"How delicious!"

"I was up on the hill after acorns. There's a stream there. I was carrying my hat in my hand and whistling 'Yankee Doodle,' and I had just jumped over a log, and my hair was down, and I know I looked my very worst, when—"

"Yes, when—"

"When I ran right on him—the man—the young man—the mysterious young man."

"And he was gathering acorns?"

"No, he wasn't. He was fishing. Yes, he just sat on a log fishing, and I couldn't see that he had caught a thing."

"And you screamed?"

"Not a scream! Cathy Dalton, do you think I'm a child?"

"Well, he raised his cap to you?"

"No, he didn't. I don't believe he even raised his eyes, though he must have heard me. He just sat there like a chump and bobbed his fishline, and he paid no more attention to me than as if I were a goose on the other bank."

Her hair was hanging—

II

"And everybody says you are so handsome!"

"Yes."

"He must be so near-sighted that he can't see the end of his nose. And you had to walk off alone?"

"Yes, but I broke down bushes and clubbed trees to show how I felt about it. Since he was a trespasser on mother's property he might have had the manners to ask me if farmers didn't feed pigs acorns to fatten them. I looked back four times before the bushes hid him, but he sat there humped up just the same."

"And wasn't looking after you?"

"Not a look. There is surely a mystery about him."

"There surely is, but we'll get to the bottom of it. We'll go after acorns this very afternoon, and we'll see if he ignores both of us. He may be suffering from unrequited love, but he needn't be a cad about it. Just wait till we march up to him!"

Dwight Pelham had graduated as an M. D. at Columbia. His health was not of the best, and he had had a hard time to pull through. Then a friend had said to him:

"Go up the country and find a quiet place to rest. Fish, hunt and loaf. Don't think of hanging out your shingle for weeks yet, and don't fall in love."

And the bearer of the new sheepskin had taken the advice. That is, he had hunted without shooting anything, fished without catching anything, and had escaped the snares of Cupid for two whole weeks when discovered sitting on the log among the acorn trees. Oh, yes, he had seen and heard the whistling girl, but Dr. Pelham was shy—very shy. He hoped to remain unnoticed himself, and he flattered himself that he had. He visited the hill a second time, not in the hope of seeing the same girl, but really to catch a fish or two. He enjoyed the chatter of the squirrels, the voices of the bluejays and the murmur of the stream, and he felt annoyed when the laughter of two girls suddenly reached his ears. He arose to go away, but they were in the path he must take, and he sat down again.

Two minutes later two young ladies appeared on the bank at his left. One whistled and the other sang. Then the whistler sang and the singer whistled.

Then they threw sticks into the water!

Then they threw clubs at the chipmunks!

Then one of them asked if tramps were ever seen in those woods.

Then the other replied that they hadn't better be seen there if they knew what was good for them. Then both giggled and kicked up the dead leaves and walked away. Dr. Pelham smiled. He was shy, but he knew their actions were girl-like. Ten minutes had passed, and he was smiling indulgently when a fish took his hook. Then a squirrel who had miscalculated his leaping distance fell short and came plump down on his head. He was in the midst of trouble when he heard a scream, and before he could locate it one of the girls came tearing through the bushes and halted before him to exclaim:

"Oh, sir, right out there!"

"Yes What is it?"

"She—she climbed a tree!"

"Well?"

"I—I told her not to, but she would do it."

"Yes, she climbed?"

"And she'd got up I don't know how many hundred feet high when she thought you were coming and—and—"

"Lost her hold and fell?"

"Yes, yes. She's crying and laughing, and I think she has broken her arm. We gig-giggled at you, but we want you to come."

"Most certainly."

It was Miss Cathy Dalton who sat with her back to the oak she had climbed, though there was a bushel of acorns on the ground around her. Yes, it was her right arm that was broken, and that wasn't the worst of it—not with her—not with a good-looking girl. In making her descent she had passed through several scraggly branches, broken down the hazel bushes and hit the ground with a great jolt. Her hair was hanging—her garments torn—face and hands scratched and one pink ear bleeding from a cut. Even her limpid tears were leaving streaks down her cheeks.

"I'll have to run for help, but I won't be gone long," said Dr Pelham when he had assured himself of the nature of the injury. And then to Miss Molly, who was also weeping in sympathy:

"Wet your handkerchief in the creek and rub it over her face and forehead and don't get excited over this thing."

In twenty minutes the doctor was back with first aid, and in thirty there was a farmer with his wagon there to convey the patient to the Durham homestead. There was considerable trouble before that broken arm was set and strapped, and so it was three or four hours after the accident when Miss Molly had opportunity to say to the girl in bed:

"Think you're awfully smart, don't you!"

"What do you mean?"

"To go and climb that tree."

"But you dared me to."

"Yes, but I didn't dare you to fall head over heels and break your arm and have a doctor and all that. I'm sorry if it hurts, but I can see your little game."

"Game? Game?"

"Yes, Miss Innocence. You are going to marry the doctor!"

And a year later when Miss Cathy told Miss Molly that she and Dr. Pelham were engaged, there was a "humph!" followed by the words:

"Of course you are! Don't I know you fell out of that tree on purpose! Well, I don't like doctors, so you can have him!"

The World's Great Machine.

Woman has always done the greater part of the labor of the world, and has done it surprisingly, even astonishingly well, when we consider the fact that many of her tools are still exceedingly primitive. Man has incessantly devised implements by which his work has been lessened, but women have plodded on, achieving as much as he, with one-half the help from inventions and appliances.

It is an encouraging sign of our times that experience and economy of effort are beginning to be studied by women. It is more difficult to manage the average house with its varying needs, occupations and problems than it is to run an average business enterprise, yet the housewife does not, as a rule, study the science of reducing labor to its minimum. She perfects the output of her hands continually, but does not spare herself, and this is her greatest mistake. The wife and mother is the great machine which keeps the world going, and she deserves no less consideration and care than that which we accord to the mechanical devices of our brains.

No woman would think of running her sewing machine without having properly oiled it, but she will run her own delicate and complicated self without the lubrication of pleasure, or the necessary adjustments of easy work and well poised action.—Armour's Farmer's Almanac.

Slight Difference.

"Waiter," said the guest, "you have brought me tea."

"No, sir," said the waiter; "that's coffee, sir."

"Well," said the guest. "I ordered cocoa."—Augusta Chronicle.

TAKING CHANCES OTHERWISE.

Hoax—He is exceedingly ill, but he is still holding his own.

Joax—He has to. There are two doctors with him all the time.

A Good Turn.

George Ade, with the gentle cynicism of the confirmed bachelor, was talking in New York about New Year resolutions.

"Every wife," he said, "loves to see her husband turn over for her sake a new leaf—in his check-book."

Why He Couldn't Sit Down.

Harry, aged six, is an orphan; but an indulgent grandmother and kind maiden aunt have taken care of him. The first pair of knickerbockers were secured recently, and it was a proud moment for the boy when his aunt put them on him on Sunday morning and he was permitted to go to church with his grandmother. Naturally maiden aunts know very little about the arrangement of knickerbockers, and there was a suspicious fullness in front and an equally mystifying tightness in the back to be observed, as the little chap trudged happily along. In church Harry sat down, but did not appear comfortable and stood up. "Harry, sit down," whispered his grandmother. He obediently climbed back on the seat, but soon slipped off again. "Harry, you must sit down." "Grandma, I can't. My pants is choking me." She looked more closely than her dim sight had before permitted, and discovered the new little knickerbockers were on hind side before. Harry stood up during the remainder of the service.

Why They Scout.

Mrs. Forward—And so two of your sons are Boy Scouts? Where do they do their reconnoitering?

Mrs. Howard—In our refrigerator.

RECOGNIZED THE ACTION.

Little Nell—I didn't know that they played "I Spy" in church, mamma.

Mamma—What do you mean, my child?

Little Nell—Why, the preacher said "Let's Play," and everybody held their hands up to their faces.

The annual per capita fire waste in Europe averages 33 cents, while in the United States it amounts to $2.51.

A Hold-Up

An Oppressive Trust.

Before the Coffee Roasters' Association, in session at Chicago on Thursday, Thomas J. Webb, of Chicago, charged that there is in existence a coffee combine which is "the most monstrous imposition in the history of human commerce."

He did

There is very slight exaggeration about this statement. It comes very close to being literally true. There is a coffee combine in Brazil, from which country comes the bulk of the coffee used in the United States, which is backed by the government of Brazil and financed by it, which compels American consumers, as Mr. Webb said, "to pay famine prices for coffee when no famine exists."

"Compels"

The worst thing about this is that the consumers of the United States have been compelled to put up the money through which this combine, to further cinch them, has been made effective. There were formerly revenue duties imposed upon all coffee entering the United States. Those taxes were denounced as an imposition upon the people; as taxing the poor man's breakfast table, and the like. The taxes were removed. Immediately thereafter Brazil imposed an export duty upon coffee up to the full amount of the former customs taxes in this country. The revenue which formerly went into the treasury of the United States was diverted to the treasury of Brazil. The poor man's breakfast coffee continued to cost him the same old price.

tax Americans

But this was only the commencement. The "valorization" plan was evolved in Brazil. Through this plan the government, using the revenues derived from the export duties for the purposes, takes all of the surplus crop in a season of large yields and holds it off the market, thus keeping the supply down to the demands of the market and permitting the planters to receive a much higher price than they would otherwise have done.

The United States consumes more Brazilian coffee than does the rest of the world. We are the best customers of Brazil, and Brazil buys little from us. Now Brazil is promoting, financing and maintaining a trust designed, and working effectively for the purpose, to compel American consumers to pay an exorbitant price for the coffee they use. What is the remedy?—Seattle Post-Intelligencer—Nov. 19, 1911.

Get this clear

Then this

Standard statistics of the coffee trade show a falling-off in sales during the last two years of over two hundred million pounds. Authenticated reports from the Postum factories in this city show a tremendous increase in the sale of Postum in a like period of time.

While the sales of Postum invariably show marked increase year over year, the extraordinary demand for that well-known breakfast beverage during 1911 is very likely due to a public awakening to the oppression of the coffee trust.

Such an awakening naturally disposes the multitude who suffer from the ill effects of coffee drinking to be more receptive to knowledge of harm which so often comes as a result of the use of the drug-beverage, coffee.—Battle Creek Evening News—Dec. 19, 1911.

POSTUM

Economy to one's purse is not the main reason for using Postum.

It is absolutely free from any harmful substance, such as "caffeine" (the drug in coffee), to which so much of the nervousness, biliousness and indigestion of today are due. Thousands of former coffee drinkers now use Postum because they know from experience the harm that coffee drinking causes.

Boil it according to directions (that's easy) and it will become clear to you why—

POULTRY

FAVORITE BREED FOR EGGS

Leghorns Mature Quickly, Are Excellent Foragers, and Are the Best Layers.

If eggs are easier and cheaper to produce than meat and bring a better price, why are not the egg laying breeds the ones to keep? says a writer in the Poultry Journal.

The Leghorns mature quickly, are good foragers, and are the best of layers—the pullets often laying when five months old. They stand confinement well in winter. Owing to their great activity, they are not so likely to have indigestion and bowel troubles as the larger breeds. As the Leghorns are not so heavily feathered, they are more easily kept free from lice.

A Grand Male Bird, Leghorn.

Now that we can hatch and raise chicks with incubators and brooders, is it not the proper thing to have the "egg machines," or the laying breeds, also?

There are some noted strains of Plymouth Rocks and White Wyandottes that are heavy layers—strains built up by patient and painstaking work in selection and breeding from the best layers, so that they lay almost or quite as well as the leghorns.

The farmer has not the time to trapnest his hens and to secure his best layers. And what is the need of it, when it is just as natural for the Leghorn to lay as it is for the Jersey cow to give us cream?

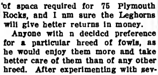
One hundred Leghorns can be kept on the feed and in the same amount of space required for 75 Plymouth Rocks, and I am sure the Leghorns will give better returns in money.

Anyone with a decided preference for a particular breed of fowls, as he would enjoy them more and take better care of them than of any other breed. After experimenting with several breeds, the Leghorns are my choice, and I have told why.

HANDY FOR POULTRY RAISERS

Little Device for Carrying Eggs May Be Made out of Ordinary Lath Nailed Together.

Here is a device for carrying eggs where they are delivered to customers in the city, writes A. J. Magee in the Farm and Fireside. It is made of ordinary plastering lath planed smooth and nailed together with small nails. Two strips are nailed together in V-shape for each corner. The bottom is made of thin board nailed to narrow strips on the inside of each side. The bail is made of heavy wire with a suitable piece of wood as a handle. The carrier can be made to hold any number of cartons one desires to carry.



Carries Eggs to Market.

(Cartons hold one dozen each.) Pile the cartons up and measure them to get the inside measurements of the carrier. I have one holding 30 dozen and another holding 24 dozen.

Winter Feed for Poultry.

One of the best and most relished winter feeds for poultry is cabbage. Even though there be an abundance of other green vegetable matter, I should still strive to add some cabbage to the list. It is true that there is nothing quite so good for the hens as a growing crop, such as rye, over which they can range and thus combine exercise with food getting, and every effort should be made to provide it, but often space is too limited for such crops and dependence must be had altogether on substitutes that can be stored away.

Look After Growing Chicks.

The welfare of chickens must be looked after during the growing period, as no amount of pampering and petting at maturity will compensate for neglect then.

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

Week's History in Gopher State Told in Paragraphs.

Winona.—The annual charity ball cleared $535 for employment of a visiting nurse in Winona.

Pine River.—The county commissioners have appropriated $500 for a Cass county exhibit at the state fair. George J. Silk will be in charge.

Washington, D. C.—The house passed a resolution authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river at Minneapolis.

Rochester.—John C. Crabb, postmaster of Rochester, and Miss Ellen S. Gran, a milliner of this city, were married at Wabasha. Rev. Frank Doran of Winona officiated.

Duluth.—Abe Hendrickson, an employe of the Swan River Logging company, at Sturgeon lake, was killed by a falling tree. The body was brought to Chisholm. He was 30 and single.

Mound Prairie.—Narrowly escaping with their lives from their burning home, John Lynch, a farmer and his family, nearly perished from cold. It was 41 below when the fire broke out.

Motley.—The residence of Mr. and Mrs. Irving Carlisle burned and five of their children were burned to death. They were Nettie, aged 14; Millie, aged 11; Pansy, aged 9; Ida Bell, aged 5, and Bessie, aged 2.

Bemidji.—The county commissioners took a decided stand in the matter of granting liquor licenses. They passed a resolution that hereafter no license will be granted in Beltrami county unless the applicant conducts a hotel in connection with his proposed saloon.

Duluth.—The Duluth demurrage bureau receipts show 415,422 cars handled in 1911, as against 405,044 cars in 1910, a gain of 10,378. There were 36,539 cars handled in December, as against 34,810 for the month a year ago. These figures do not include iron ore cars.

Duluth.—Postoffice thieves at McGregor, Aitkin county, have a sense of humor. While Postmaster J. W. Clark was in Duluth giving evidence in a case against a prisoner for an offense against the McGregor postoffice, thieves looted the McGregor office of $75 in stamps and money.

Faribault.—A large barn belonging to Ed Thatcher at Morristown, near here, was destroyed by fire. Thatcher is a breeder of Shetland ponies and fifteen head were burned to death in the fire. The loss of the barn alone will amount to about $3,000. The cause of the fire is unknown.

St. Paul.—The day of the wildcat promoter may be past in Minnesota as well as Kansas, if the next legislature adopts a recommendation which Governor Eberhart expects to incorporate in his message, urging the necessity of action to protect the public from the sale of stocks in worthless enterprises.

Washington.—The house passed a resolution authorizing the committee on interior department expenditures to conduct investigations of Indian affairs at the White Earth reservation in Minnesota and at other western reservations. The proposed trip was denounced as a "junket" during the debate on the resolution.

Duluth.—Word has reached Duluth from International Falls that the Backus Brooks interests who control the Minnesota, Dakota & Western road, which runs westerly for thirty miles from International Falls, will this year extend the line to Thief River Falls, where it will connect with the Soo line, and ultimately be operated by the Soo line.

Washington.—Major Strunk of the army engineer corps and in charge of the Minnesota district, is in the city. He will confer with members of the congressional delegation regarding internal improvement projects in the state and especially with Senator Nelson and Representative Steenerson, regarding the plan for removing the dam in Red Lake.

Blue Earth.—The board of education has voted unanimously to introduce a course in agriculture under the Lee-Benson act, to begin next fall. An appropriate outfit of material will be secured and a competent instructor employed. The public schools now have domestic science, manual training, a normal department, special teachers in drawing, music and kindergarten, and laboratories fully equipped for science teaching.

St. Paul.—Decision that the Morrison County Agricultural Co-operative Society of Little Falls is entitled to the state aid holding annual fairs, and not the Morrison County Agricultural association of Motley, which also laid claim to the appropriation, was given to the State Auditor S. G. Iverson. The decision means that the Little Falls society will receive immediately $623.50, its proportion of state aid for 1911, which was held up pending the settlement of the dispute between the two organizations as to seniority, and is the only society in Morrison county which will be entitled to receive such state aid in the future.

Washington.—The change in committee assignments made necessary by the death of Senator Frye were made by the senate. Senator Nelson was made chairman of the committee on commerce; Senator Smoot of the committee on public lands; Senator Richardson of the committee on printing; Senator Lorimer of the committee on Pacific islands and Porto Rica, and Senator Poindexter on the committee of mines and mining. Senator Crane was assigned to the vacancy on the committee on commerce and Senator Dillingham to the vacancy on foreign relations.

REACHED LIMIT OF TORTURE

Real Reason Why Burglar Gave Evening Papers Chance to Use Effective Headline.

A burglar broke into a New York mansion early the other morning and found himself after wandering about the place in the music room. Hearing footsteps approaching, he took refuge behind a screen. From eight to nine the eldest daughter had a singing lesson. From nine to ten the second daughter took a piano lesson. From ten to eleven the eldest son got his instruction on the violin. From eleven to twelve the younger boy got a lesson on the flute and piccolo. Then, at 12:15, the family got together and practiced music on all their instruments. They were fixing up for a concert. At 12:45 the porch-climber staggered from behind the screen. "For heaven's sake, send for the police!" he shrieked. "Torture me no longer!" And in the evening paper there was the headline: "Nervy Children Capture Desperate Burglar."

THE ONE TO BE PLEASED.

De Jew—No, we never have roast pork at our house any more.

De Paw—Why, I thought you were very fond of it?

De Jaw—So I am, but my wife's pet dog won't eat any of it at all.

Welcome.

It was 3 o'clock on a cold and frosty morning, and the weary cyclist had still many miles to go.

Passing through a lonely village he saw a lighted window. Perhaps, he thought, he might be able to get something to eat and drink. So he knocked.

"Who's there?" came a gruff voice from within.

"A traveler," the cyclist replied in clear tones.

Back like a shot came the answer: "Then travel!"

The Boy—The Girl.

He—Crime seems in a pretty low way. Only last week some woman kidnaped a baby—photographs of it in all the newspapers.

She—What did she take it for?

He—Nothing else to take, I suppose. I should have thought myself that anybody who kidnaped a baby would steal an earthquake or borrow an attack of Asiatic cholera.

She—Babies are not so bad as all that. The only thing I have really got against them is that if you leave them long enough they grow up into human beings.

Even when they have nothing to do, some people can't seem to do it gracefully.

A Golf Story.

There's another story of a man who rang the bell at the gates of Paradise and asked Peter if he might go through.

"What were you on earth?" asked the saint.

"Well," was the response, "during the latter part of my life I didn't do much but play golf."

"Got a golf ball on you?"

"Yes; here's a 'Chancellor.'"

St. Peter took it and threw it over his shoulder, where it rolled away.

For a minute or more he looked critically at the applicant, then shut the gate in his face and locked it.

"What's the game?" said the man.

"You are no real golfer," said St. Peter. "You don't even know the first rule of golf—to keep your eye on the ball and follow through."

Women's Secrets

There is one man in the United States who has perhaps heard more women's secrets than any other man or woman in the country. These secrets are not secrets of guilt or shame, but the secrets of suffering, and they have been confided to Dr. R. V. Pierce in the hope and expectation of advice and help. That few of these women have been disappointed in their expectations is proved by the fact that ninety-eight per cent. of all women treated by Dr. Pierce have been absolutely and altogether cured. Such a record would be remarkable if the cases treated were numbered by hundreds only. But when that record applies to the treatment of more than half-a-million women, in a practice of over 40 years, it is phenomenal, and entitles Dr. Pierce to the gratitude accorded him by women, as the first of specialists in the treatment of women's diseases.

Every sick woman may consult Dr. Pierce by letter, absolutely without charge. All replies are mailed, sealed in perfectly plain envelopes, without any printing or advertising whatever, upon them. Write without fear as without fee, to World's Dispensary Medical Association, Dr. R. V. Pierce, Prest., Buffalo, N. Y.

WHEN CUPID MEETS MARS

By EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W. A. PATTERSON

AT army headquarters in the capital it is always possible to pick up stories of the service, and let it be said that they are not always stories of war. Cupid was armed, even though his weapon was only a bow, and Mars takes kindly to Cupid.

Two of these army tales made a listener take the liberty of asking the right to reproduce, and so here they are given with some slight change of name, but with no change of circumstances.

First Lieutenant Robert Emmett Kavanaugh was pacing up and down his narrow quarters in Fort Grady, Michigan, holding a telegram in his hand. He had read it twenty times, but at every second turn in his nervous walk he read it again. The telegram was dated Chicago, and this is what it said: "Leave Thursday for Florida. Uncle Frank ill. Stay indefinite. Norah Desmond."

Lieutenant Bob Kavanaugh and Norah Desmond were engaged. They were to be married as soon as a few accommodating superior officers would consent to be killed off or die in their beds and thereby give Bob a chance to write captain instead of lieutenant before his name on official papers. The young officer had fixed the limit of his waiting at about a year.

"Norah's going to Florida," he muttered to himself. "I haven't seen her for three weeks and won't see her for six months to come. Uncle Frank is one of the kind who never dies and never gets well, and Norah'll stay down there until the old man is willing to let her go. She's more of a stickler for duty than Old Muggs, the commanding officer, and that's saying a lot. He won't give me a leave. I've had too many. Great Winfield Scott, but I would like to see Norah before she goes." And Lieutenant Robert Emmett Kavanaugh sighed.

Kavanaugh couldn't keep anything to himself, and in five minutes he was telling his woes to Captain Percy Lanyard of the artillery corps. "Brace up, Kavanaugh," said Lanyard; "Muggs is going to send a general prisoner through Chicago to Fort Sherman to stand trial. He was going to send a sergeant in charge. It isn't a very pleasant duty, but if you'll volunteer, I think Muggs will send you, and you can stop off on your way back from Sherman—it is only a few miles from Chicago—and see your blue-eyed Norah before she gets on the Florida 'limited.'"

Twelve hours from that time Bob Kavanaugh was sitting in the smoking car of a Chicago bound train, with a big Colt revolver strapped around him and an enlisted man, with a downcast look, sitting alongside of him. Bob Kavanaugh had a soft heart. The soldier at his side had seen eight years of service and had never been in trouble before. He had assaulted the "top" sergeant, a serious offense in the army, as may go without saying.

"Cheer up, Spencer," said the lieutenant; "you've been a good soldier, as I know, and I don't think it will go very hard with you—six months at the most—and then you'll be restored to duty."

"I hit him, all right, lieutenant," answered Private James Spencer, "and he deserved it if ever a man did, but you can't do such things in the army, no matter what the 'top' says to you, and so I am good for two years and a 'bobtail' discharge. It's tough. I never saw the inside of the 'mill' before in my eight years' service, except when I was on guard."

Part of a freight train went into a ditch ahead of the Fort Grady passenger train. Kavanaugh and his prisoner were delayed five hours. The lieutenant fumed and said things under his breath. Finally the way was cleared and the train ran on to Chicago. It was Thursday and in four hours Norah's train would leave for Florida. It was utterly impossible for the officer to get his prisoner to Fort Sherman and to return in time to say good-by to his fiancee.

Kavanaugh and his charge stepped from the train into the Chicago depot. Bob's heart was sore. "I must see her," he said to himself. "I can't stand it for six months." At that instant he saw at the depot cigar stand, making a purchase, Jack Bacon, a Chicago club man and an intimate friend. Kavanaugh hurried his charge over toward the young fellow. "Jack, old man, glad to see you. You have an hour or two to spare, I know you have. Don't say no," and with that the lieutenant grabbed his friend by the arm, motioned his prisoner to walk ahead, and the three went on a half trot into the office of a hotel across the street. Kavanaugh threw a $2 bill before the clerk and ordered a room. He hurried the astounded Bacon and the prisoner into the apartment on the second floor.

"Jack," said Kavanaugh, in a low tone, "as you love me, watch this man. I must see Norah Desmond. She's off to Florida. Take this gun and don't fail me," and with that First Lieutenant Robert Emmett Kavanaugh shoved a revolver into Jack Bacon's hand, bolted through the door, out of the hotel and on to a trolley car. In twenty minutes he was with Norah Desmond, who was in the midst of the last hours of preparation for her Florida trip.

In twenty minutes more the doorbell of the flat rang violently. The maid opened it and in rushed Jack Bacon, flushed and fairly beside himself. "Bob," he yelled, "your prisoner skipped. He kicked open a door into the next room and jumped onto a low roof and then into the alley. I took a shot at him, but missed, and when I got down he was clean gone."

Bob Kavanaugh sank into a chair, his face pale. "Norah," he said, "this means court-martial and dismissal for me unless I can catch the fellow. It's a clean case of neglect of duty, awful neglect of duty, and old Muggs doesn't love me any too well, anyway. It's all up, dear, if I don't get him, and if I am kicked out of the army I don't know what I'll do. I can't even dig a ditch, though I'd try willingly enough for you. But this won't catch him. I'm off, but I'll be at the train to say good-by," and Kavanaugh was out of the door and down the stairs four steps at a time.

Bolted through the door

"Halt, friends"

Miss Curtis

Over on Halsted street in a room above a store a pretty, pale girl sat talking to a soldier in uniform. "It's all up, Polly," he was saying, "I hit the 'top' sergeant. He deserved it, but I was put in arrest and was to be tried, and it meant two years. I just cut away from a 'cit' whom the officer who had me in tow left me in care of. The officer went to see his girl. I guess he's in love or he wouldn't have done such a fool trick. Well, I'm in love, too, Polly dear, but I've got to get out of this as soon as I can get other togs on."

"Oh, this is awful, Jim," said the girl, "and you'll be a deserter, too."

"I won't get any more for that than I'd get for the other. I don't like the idea any better than you do. I guess the officer will get it harder than I will. It's neglect of duty with him and they'll kick him out of the service. I'm sorry for him, for he isn't half a bad sort." Then suddenly changing the subject the soldier said, "How's your mother?"

"Better, Jim, but she'd have died if it hadn't been for Miss Norah Desmond. She's an angel. I had to stop work to nurse mother, and the money gave out and I got sick, and Miss Norah gave us a nurse and a doctor and did lots else. I think she saved my life, too."

"Norah Desmond, Polly? That's the name of the girl the lieutenant I cut from is to marry. He'll be disgraced and the girl will suffer. She saved you and your mother, did she, Polly? Get on your things, quick. She leaves for Florida. I know the train. The lieutenant 'll be there, I know that. Hurry, girl."

Lieutenant Robert Emmett Kavanaugh was kissing Norah Desmond good-by. His face was pale and anxious. "I'm afraid it's all up with me, Norah," he was saying, "but keep up a good heart."

Just then from behind him came a voice loud and with something of a ring of humor in it. "Sir, all are present and accounted for." Kavanaugh turned like a flash. There stood Private Spencer saluting with his right hand, while his left was holding that of a very pretty girl.

"Spencer, you're a brick," said Kavanaugh, and nothing but army training kept him from slapping his inferior on the back. "I'll use every official friend I have to get you out of your scrape."

A year later in pleasant quarters at Fort Grady sat Captain Kavanaugh and his wife. "Norah," he said, "First Sergeant James Spencer has applied for a furlough to go to Chicago to get married. Shall I approve the application?"

"Bob, if you don't," said Norah, with her eyes dancing, "I'll get a divorce."

The story of Robert Emmett Kavanaugh and Norah Desmond was told by an "ancient" just about ready to take his place on the retired list. The second story of West Point life came from the lips of a stripling soldier who perhaps had recent and keen memories of the matter in hand.

"Do your duty though the heavens fall," said the commandant of cadets to the battalion of stripling soldiers. The commandant had a curious way of mixing his aphorisms, but he meant well.

Obedience and devotion to duty are the keynotes of the scale of life's harmony at West Point.

Billy Lang was a first classman. Billy was a private. He probably would have been a cadet officer if he hadn't been caught the previous winter taking a trip to Cold Spring over the frozen surface of the Hudson.

It was in Billy's "yearling camp" that he met Frances Curtis.

Billy Lang was the oldest man in his class and consequently was called "dad." He was just under the age limit when he entered and would be within a month of 26 when he graduated. Now Billy was in love with Frances Curtis.

He was sitting with her now under the trees near the camp guard tents. Billy was on guard, though off post for the time being.

"You see, Miss Curtis," he said, "the second class being on furlough and the 'plebes' not being military enough yet to do duty, we first classmen have to walk post to help the 'yearlings' out. When the plebes are turned in to the battalion we will do guard duty only as officers."

"It must be hard work, this walking up and down all night long, Mr. Lang," said Frances, "but then it's duty and I always did admire a soldier's devotion to his duty."

"Yes, duty is everything. I was always a great stickler for it," answered Billy. "One should always do his duty up to the handle, no matter what direction it takes nor whom the doing of it hits."

"I think you are right, Mr. Lang. There's a certain nobility about it that appeals to one."

Billy Lang was hugely pleased to find that on the subject of duty Frances Curtis' ideas coincided with his own. He changed the subject, however, abruptly. "I see that Mr. Jackson is here," he said, looking at Frances in a half-curious way.

"Yes," answered the girl, a touch of color coming into her cheeks, "he came up on the Powell yesterday and is to stay here until tomorrow."

Frederick Jackson was a civilian admirer of Miss Curtis.

"I'm sorry I'm on guard today, Miss Curtis," said Billy, "for there is a hop tonight in the mess hall, and I can't be there. I shall think of you waltzing while I am walking my dreary post."

"What number are you, Mr. Lang?"

"Number four," answered Billy. "It's just back of the commandant's tent and runs parallel to the road leading along the bluff to the hotel. I go on post at taps and walk until midnight. I'll be there just at the time the hop is over."

"Hurry up and turn out, first relief," yelled the corporal of the guard, and Billy Lang said a hasty good-by and dug out at double time for the gun rack outside the first guard tent.

"It's duty," he sighed to himself, "a hard duty, but still duty even if it does take you away from the girl you love."

It was eleven o'clock at night. Taps had sounded an hour earlier. Billy Lang was pacing up and down number four between the trunks of the great elms, which, with the sentinels, guarded the camp. It was the blackest kind of a night. Up on Crow's Nest mountain and to the northward toward the Catskills Hudson's crew was playing tenpins. It is a long bowling alley which Old Rip's friends use when they begin their favorite game. The thunder came nearer and the lightning played overhead. This is a time when the sentinel, with his steel bayonet pointing skyward, feels more nervously apprehensive than when in the face of a human enemy. Patter, patter, patter, the rain began to fall on the leaves of the elms. The sentinels on number four knew that in a minute the gates would be open and then deluge.

The flickering oil lamp at the south end of the post sent a feeble gleam out into the darkness. Forty yards down the roadway Billy Lang saw someone approaching. "Who comes there?" rang out the challenge.

"Friends," came the answer in a man's voice.

A flash of lightning lit up the roadway and Billy Lang saw Frederick Jackson and Frances Curtis held motionless by his challenge. At that instant came the deluge. Umbrellaless and unprotected in any way stood the young couple, straining their eyes toward a place where they knew was a young fellow with a bayonet-tipped rifle.

Billy Lang knew that he could strain a point and let the two pass. Any cadet in the corps would have done it on recognition as certain as his. But Billy was a stickler for duty. He knew his orders. "Halt, friends," he said, and then raising his voice, he yelled, "Corporal of the guard No. 4."

How the rain did come down. Frances Curtis' light ball dress was a rag. She was chilled through and she stood holding the arm of her escort and shivering from her light slippers to the bedraggled rose that crowned her hair. Frederick Jackson was in as bad a plight, though he didn't allow himself to shiver.

"It's my duty," said Billy Lang to himself, "and Frances is a stickler for duty; she'll like me all the better for it."

The corporal came at last. He allowed the shivering couple to pass on to the hotel. He saw the plight they were in, and if he hadn't been a 'yearling' corporal and Billy Lang a first classman he would have told No. 4 that he was an ass for not using a little common sense and allowing the storm-stricken pair to pass.

Frederick Jackson left for New York the next morning. When he was relieved from guard Billy Lang called at the hotel. Miss Curtis could not be seen that day. She was slightly indisposed. The next afternoon Billy Lang received a note. It was in Frances Curtis' handwriting. It read like this: "A telegram from New York tells mother that Mr. Jackson is dangerously ill with pneumonia as a result of exposure in the storm. He has no relatives nearer than England. I am a great stickler for duty and so mother and I are just leaving for New York to nurse Mr. Jackson. You will doubtless applaud my course, for you are one of duty's own disciples."

Frances Curtis did not return to West Point that summer. It was late in the fall when the postman one day handed Billy Lang an envelope postmarked New York. It contained wedding cards in which the names of Curtis and Jackson were prominent.

A yearling corporal stuck his head in the door. "Tomorrow, Lang," he said, "you are on special duty."

"D—n duty," said Billy.

And the officer of the day who was passing "skinned" him for profanity.

PLAN SUMMER HOME

Colorado Citizens Would Provide Mansion for President.

Drawings Have Been Finished for a Veritable Palace of Picturesque Design for Occupancy by the Chief Executive.

Denver, Colo.—The citizens of Colorado have started a campaign to provide for the president of the United States a summer home in this state. The plans, which have already been completed, call for a veritable palace of most original and picturesque design, the like of which does not exist in this country. It will take rank with any of the existing palaces of European monarchs. The idea originated with John Brisben Walker, and a committee of prominent Colorado men is now in charge of the movement.

The proposed home is on the Mount Falcon, 15 miles from Denver, in the front range of the Rockies. It is planned to make the gift a token from the people of Colorado, and contributions are now coming in from all over the state. The fund was started by subscriptions from leading bankers and business men in Denver. Ground has already been broken and it is believed that the building will be constructed in time for the next summer season.

During his recent visit to Denver, President Taft was apprised of the summer home plan, and expressed the opinion that no locality could offer finer natural attractions for such a structure.

The proposed house will be unique in many ways and exceedingly attractive. The plans call for a noble and massive structure of grey granite, contrasting with the natural setting for the building. The house will provide ample room for the president's attendants and assistants. Automobiles would bring the summer home with forty minutes of Denver.

The view that the site of the building commands is its strongest feature, and it is this that was strongly urged in making a choice of sites. Among all the wonderful and beautiful scenic spots within a short distance of Denver, Mount Falcon, perhaps, stands pre-eminent. From the north terrace of the mountain, upon which the drawing-room and library will open, the steep mountain side, wooded with pines, drops down 2,000 feet into the rushing waters of Bear creek; to the south, 75 miles away, is Pike's peak. Denver lies 14 miles away to the northeast. When a passing cloud covers the city with its shadow, the plains seem barren of houses. Then suddenly the sunlight pierces through, and a great city stands revealed.

PLACES MONEY IN SHOE BOX

Woman Mistakes Receptacle in a New York Hotel for Safety Deposit Vault.

New York.—Mistaking a small wooden box built into the wall of her room at the Waldorf-Astoria for a safe-deposit box, a woman of Georgetown, S. C., who arrived in New York, deposited $900 in cash and jewelry valued at $6,000 in the box that night, and retired with the satisfaction that her valuables would be secure. When she awoke next morning the gems and money were missing.

Soon afterward William Peterson, a hotel valet, turned up with the $900 and the missing jewelry.

"While making my rounds for the shoes at 2 a. m.," said he, "I found this money and jewelry in the box where the shoes are placed."

Smoker Stricken Blind.

Venice, Ill.—Martin Conway, an excavating contractor, inspecting work on the river levee here, stopped suddenly and raised his hands to his eyes. He tried for a moment to rub away the thick mist that had suddenly fallen over his vision. A moment before he had been looking over the long dike, without a thought of any impairment of his sight. Now he is totally blind.

His friends believe Conway's constant smoking affected the optic nerve, causing the sudden breakdown.

TALES OF GOTHAM AND OTHER CITIES

"Cat's Soul" Is Involved in Big Suit

WELL, WHAT DO YOU THINK OF IT?

NEW YORK.—As if a page had been torn from the old Knickerbocker "blue book" and its personages summoned to court, was the remarkable assemblage before Surrogate Fowler when the contest to set aside the will of Maria L. Campbell, who left a $2,000,000 estate to four favorite cousins, was continued.

In the forty or more men and women of aristocratic ancestry who seek to break the octogenarian spinster's will there were stately Van Rensselaers, proud Livingstons, Crosbys; Campbells, richly gowned; Townsends, with lorgnettes and splendid furs; Scudders and Berrys and others who go to make up "old New York." Many of the women, worn by age, gossipped and greeted others they had not met for years.

A woman who believed that a cat had a soul, and who believed that the soul of her long dead sister Katherine was "still upstairs," was not in her proper mind, the aristocratic contestants hold, to make a will.

Mrs. Kiliaen Van Rensselaer, her son Stephen and William B. Blackwell, interested parties to the contest, have testified to acts of irrationality or intimated that their relative was not of sound mind.

Dances Planned for City Buildings

BOSTON.—Public dances in municipal buildings, with proper restrictions and chaperonage, is the suggestion advanced by Miss Alice P. Vanston of the Social Service House, as a remedy for the conditions in the dance halls.

"I want to say first of all," Miss Vanston replied, when asked her opinion on the dance problem, "that there should be some place where the girls and boys can dance. It may be that the chief injury done by the public dance halls comes from the fact that very young children are admitted to them.

"Boys and girls get their first and only idea of dancing from what they see in these halls. The remedy for this has been suggested in the raising of the age limit from seventeen to twenty-one years. This would cut out from the enjoyment of a very innocent recreation a very large number of young people. The enforcement of proper conditions and careful supervision would be better, it seems to me, than this discipline by elimination.

"When a girl is shut up in a factory all day she must have some other exercise, and dancing gives her a good general exercise, which she can enjoy with music and among her equals.

"Every neighborhood should have a building where the men who pay taxes and their wives and children may enjoy the things that are perfectly legitimate and healthful, under municipal direction. It is not paternalism. It is just ordinary common decency.

"The girls would be glad to go to good places if there were such. They enjoy intensely the dances arranged by the various social settlements. Those places are always overcrowded, and are always crying for more room.

"Why may not the public school buildings be used for the public? In most of them there are excellent halls which would make most desirable dance halls. People are willing to trust their daughters in a public school building. Behind such buildings stands the honor of the city.

Many Jobless Actors Besiege Chicago

CHICAGO.—Fifteen hundred "professionals" — leading men and women, chorus girls and men, "leads," "heavies," vaudevillians, representing every type of actor and actress—are now resting on Chicago's Rialto.

Within three weeks about forty companies have folded tents in nearby towns and the members have hurried to Clark and Randolph streets looking for "openings" and discussing the most disastrous year in theatricals in a decade.

Local theatrical agencies are crowded daily. Managers declare there are more theatrical men and women seeking employment in Chicago now than in years—even including the summertime, when "resting" is usually a habit.

"Company after company has returned to Chicago within the last week," said Harry Armstrong, a booking agent. "There are 200 applicants for every place I can offer."

"At least a thousand actors and actresses are looking for work here now," was the statement from the Rowland & Clifford offices, which closed three companies recently. "Usually when the new year comes around there are a large number of companies going out, but this year it is 'all coming in and nothing going out.'"

"There are hundreds of chorus girls here now looking for places where usually it is hard to find any at this time of year," said Harry Askin, manager of the LaSalle opera house.

"Small dramatic and musical companies have had a hard season," said A. Milo Bennett, a veteran Chicago booking agent. "Managers are complaining that they cannot get enough shows, and the owners of the companies are saying they cannot get audiences."

Many companies are returning daily from neighboring states. Some of actors are being placed in southern stock companies, but hundreds, and maybe thousands, will be without work for some time to come.

Girl Clad as Man Taken as Robber

THIS GETTIN' CAUGHT IS TH' WORST PART OF BEIN' A BURGLAR

NYACK, N. Y.—Still garbed in the suit of boy's clothing she wore when captured, Miss Estelle McElroy, eighteen years old, was locked up in the Hillburn jail. The girl was arrested in the search for the leader of a band for whom the police have been looking for months. A charge of attempted burglary is made against her.

The prisoner was a Sunday school pupil, active in church work and a member of the Temperance Union at Hillburn.

For months the police of villages in Rockland county have been looking for a band of burglars who robbed factories, private houses and postoffices. The robberies were evidently the work of skilled thieves, but not once was any clue left on which the detectives could start their work. Hillburn, Nyack and Suffern were visited and once the robbers stole several thousand dollars' worth of goods from a store at New City, within a stone's throw of the county jail.

As a result of the many burglaries the villages have doubled their police forces, but such vigilance proved in vain. Houses and factories that were passed hourly were robbed by the thieves and no clue left.

Just before daylight the other day Constables Slavin and Sibley, of Hillburn, arrested the girl and Fred Monroe in the Hillburn Bronze Metal Works, which they were preparing to rob, it is alleged.

The McElroy girl had her hair tightly braided and the braids concealed under a cap. When the girl was locked up she became hysterical for a time, but all efforts to get information from her regarding the other robberies in Rockland county proved futile.

WHO'S WHO—AND WHY

FRENCH CHIEF WITH TAFT

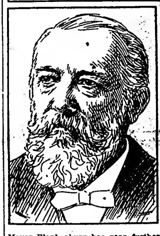
President Taft's efforts to secure the ratification of arbitration treaties with France and Great Britain was the special theme of an official speech made recently by President Fallieres at the New Year's reception to the diplomatic corps at the Elysee palace in Paris. There was a large attendance of diplomats at the function, among them being Robert Bacon, the American ambassador.

Sir Francis L. Bertie, the British ambassador and dean of the diplomatic corps, presented to the French executive the New Year felicitations of the foreign representatives. He declared that he and the other members of the corps felt certain that France would continue to be a powerful aid in every work having in view the progress of civilization. He added that this permitted the hope that the generous initiative of the president of the United States in favor of the extension of arbitration to international questions would be productive of larger results during the coming year.

"The countries we represent," continued Sir Francis, "know that they are sure to find in France a powerful auxiliary with which to obtain these results."

Responding, President Fallieres assured the diplomats that France would labor in behalf of progress.

NEW MAYOR ON THE LID



"Corrupt and contented" no longer describes the condition of Philadelphia. The new administration of Mayor Blankenburg is purifying the city and vice is already on the run, seeking cover.

The other Sunday for the first time in 30 years the saloons of the city were closed and all of Philadelphia from center to circumference was as dry as a bone. Not only were the saloons closed, but even the unincorporated clubs shut their doors, and the various speak-easies, of which there are more than 1,000 in the city, were in the main as quiet as a graveyard. The few that opened were promptly raided. The doom of the speak-easies has been sounded in Philadelphia, for not only is the administration opposed to their existence, but the brewers and licensed saloonkeepers are also making war on them and soon their names will be only a memory.

But the reform administration of Mayor Blankenburg has gone further, and disreputable resorts of all kinds are under the ban. Fully 600 of these vile dens have already closed.

The closing of saloons, however, on Sunday has given offense to a large German element, which consider the use of beer as much a right on Sunday as upon week days, and they feel particularly displeased because it is a German who is depriving them of what they consider their rights.

GOVERNOR ENGAGED TO MARRY

Robert Perkins Bass, governor of Hampshire, is engaged to be married to Miss Edith Bird, daughter of Charles S. Bird of East Walpole, and a granddaughter of the late Francis W. Bird. She is well known in the Norfolk Hunt club and for her exploits in the hunting field. For the last two or three years she has made her home in New York. She is a brilliant conversationalist and a young woman of striking personality.

Mr. Bass is the first public primary governor of New Hampshire. He was nominated in 1910 over Bertram Ellis of Keene in a state-wide primary in which the old organization supported Ellis and the so-called Progressives, who had grown up around the Winston Churchill candidacy, voted for Bass. He was elected in November, 1910. He was one of the speakers at the recent meeting of Progressive Republicans in Tremont Temple, in Boston, with George L. Record of New Jersey and Gifford Pinchot of New York. It is understood that Governor Bass is likely to represent the east as the vice-presidential nominee on the ticket in the event the Progressives control the next Republican convention.

IS HEAD OF POSTAL BANKS

Theodore L. Weed, chief clerk of the postoffice department and Postmaster General Hitchcock's principal executive assistant in the management of the department, has been appointed director of the postal savings system at $5,000 a year. He will assume his duties immediately.

The extraordinary development of the postal savings system caused Mr. Hitchcock to organize a special bureau to take up the work.

Mr. Weed was appointed to the government service from Connecticut in 1898.

Mr. Hitchcock predicts that before the end of the current fiscal year the postal savings deposits will exceed $50,000,000 and that the system not only will be self-sustaining but a source of profit to the government. Already the deposits have reached a total in excess of $15,000,000.

Of the four important offices that opened for business August 1 last, Chicago on November 30, the date of the last available statistics, led with deposits of $577,812, New York being second with $411,769, Boston third with $163,464 and St. Louis fourth with $119,606.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Noted Guerrilla Survives the Knife

I COULD GO THROUGH ANOTHER WAR —

WASHINGTON.—Col. John S. Mosby, known some years ago to the good people of the north as a guerrilla, and occasionally as something worse, a man who, it is said, went about his raiding with a price on his head, lives in Washington today and goes about its streets sturdily, with his head up, his eye bright and his falcon nose as warlike in expression—for noses have expression—as it was in the days of civil strife.

Two years ago Colonel Mosby was taken to a hospital to be operated upon for appendicitis. The surgeons told him that he probably could not pull through. "I'll pull through," he said, and he did. Recently he has been writing stories about his civil war career, taking up the pen just after stepping off the lecture platform.

Colonel Mosby did not attend the last reunion of the men of his command. He has not, in fact, attended their reunion for some years, because it is said there was a feeling against him because he became a federal office holder not long after the war, being easily "reconstructed." Grant liked Mosby, and he did what he could for him, just as he did for Longstreet, who also suffered from southern disdain because he was willing to accept an office at the hands of an old West Point comrade.

When Mosby was raiding between the armies and capturing all kinds of northern property, he gave little thought to the safety of certain of his own belongings. Just as the war was about to end, a Union officer captured 8,000 pounds of tobacco belonging to the guerrilla chieftain. The raider did not like it, for his loss was made the subject of jokes innumerable. The confederate said nothing for a long time, for there was a certain adage which had to do with turn about and fair play, and he thought presumably that people would hold that it fitted his case.

After the years went by the raider thought of his 8,000 pounds of tobacco and of its value in money. He petitioned the United States senate to pass a bill which would give him the right to go to the court of claims for payment for the tobacco confiscated by the government.

It was said at the time that the old rebel chieftain had the raiding instinct so strong in him that he must needs make a foray against the United States treasury. The senate granted the colonel leave to go to the court of claims, but whether he ever recovered the money for his 8,000 pounds of fine cut and plug the records are not at hand to show.

Mystery of the U. S. Army Uniforms

WHO is responsible for the many unnecessary and idiotic changes in our army uniforms? Those who have suffered most, officers of the regular army and of the National Guard, long suspected that the general staff could, if it were so minded, throw some light upon this outrage.

Recently the Army and Navy Journal editorially assured the victims that the general staff was innocent.

The quartermaster general and the commissary general are not involved. The surgeon general is entirely above suspicion.

Brig. Gen. Clarence Edwards, chief of the insular bureau, can be acquitted. He has but infrequent opportunities to wear a uniform, and his official and social duties are such that he would have but little time to work out the details of such a formidable conspiracy against the purses and the comfort of the army at large.

While no denial has come from Major Butt, no sensible mortal will seek to fasten upon the gallant Archie the stigma of the uniform trickery.

Recognizing, as he must, that his tenure of office as aid to the president is threatened, he would be loth to visit upon himself the burden of having to purchase expensive toggery.

There remains but one logical solution; that is, that some clerk in the war department has, in the spirit of a practical joker, prepared the orders changing the uniform, and, being familiar with the overworked condition of the general staff, has succeeded in slipping them through unscrutinized.

Young America Is Going to School

SCHOOL TERM INCREASED FROM 144 DAYS TO 155 DAYS ETC— ETC—FINE

THE highest average of school attendance in the history of the American school system was reached in the year 1909, according to statistics gathered by the United States bureau of education. Figures for 1910 are not yet available, but the opinion was expressed by Dr. F. B. Dresslar of the bureau that 1910 would show still better results.

Returns show, he declared, that the length of the school term increased from 144 days in 1900 to 155 days in 1909, while in the same period the average number of days attended by each pupil rose from 99 to 113. This means that more than half a month has been added to the average length of the school term, and in this particular alone educational effectiveness has been increased during the last decade about 8 per cent.

"In 1910 our figures show," he said, "that the average daily attendance in the public schools was 10,632,772, which was 69.6 per cent. of the enrollment; in 1909 the average daily attendance reached 12,684,837, being 72.5 per cent. of the number enrolled. These figures seem to warrant the conclusion that the children have attended the public schools more regularly during the past decade than in any previous one of our educational history."

Arraigned for White Lead Peril

DEATHS ARE DUE TO INDIFFERENCE OF FACTORY OWNERS ETC—
THESE INVESTIGATORS' INDIFFERENCE TO US POOR MANUFACTURERS IS SOMETHIN' FIERCE — WE SHOULD HAVE OUR RIGHTS —! !?

DR. ALICE HAMILTON, chief investigator of occupational disease for the federal government, has completed a thorough investigation of the white lead industry of the United States in its relation to lead poisoning. Her report, which is issued as part of a bulletin of the bureau of labor, contains many disquieting facts and figures. In 16 months from January 1, 1910, to April 30, 1911, 358 specific cases of lead poisoning were discovered, 16 of which resulted in death.

The report is intended to guide legislators in framing needed laws for the protection of workers in the lead industry. American manufacturers are accused of carelessness and indifference in this most important matter.

The apathy of managers and superintendents in many of the 22 plants visited by her is ascribed by Dr. Hamilton to ignorance. They had regarded white lead poisoning as inevitable and did not understand the need of precaution.

"Even more striking," says the report, "was the ignorance shown by owners or managers as to actual sickness among their men. Several times men, apparently quite sincere, maintained that there was no lead poisoning at all in their factories. In one instance the manager said that they had only two cases in seven years; 17 cases were found in the hospital records of some 15 months. Another manager challenged the writer to find one case for which his factory was responsible, and 21 were found scattered through two years' time. This manager promptly installed a physician as medical examiner, a measure he had up to that time considered quite superfluous."

THE SCHOOL FOR COURTSHIP.

Courtship is an art so fine and subtle that the world has gone on for thousands of years with scarcely a thought of reducing it to anything like a definite science to be taught and learned by rule. The romancers, to be sure, have woven innumerable tales from this Garden of Shy Love, and lately the realists have begun digging lustily among its roots and hidden tendrils; indeed, the typical novel of today is concerned far more with the physiology than with the sentiment of courtship. Matrimonial bureaus have been established, too, and perhaps in certain desperate cases they have justified their trade. It has been left, however, to a high school in Los Angeles to lead the way by establishing a thoroughgoing department for the art of getting married—and of staying married, says the Atlanta Journal. The courses are proving immensely popular. There are five classes in which the girls are carefully tutored in matters of deportment during the various phases of wooing. They are also instructed in household management, home dietetics, dressmaking, millinery and the care of babies. It was originally planned that the boys of Los Angeles should be permitted to take these courses next year. There is now a prevailing opinion, however, that this will be altogether unnecessary, for when the girls have mastered their subject and have sharpened their instructive skill with special knowledge, what need, pray, will there be of any man knowing anything at all about courtship? The fact is, the average damsel, though she should be reared, as Perdita was, upon a lonely trouserless island, can come upon the carpet at 18 and win as many proposals as she sets her head to. O, those wise women of the West? The Wise Men of the East were nothing to them.

There are more ways of getting the most out of the land than adding to its fertility by plowing in guano or phosphates. "Seedcorn" Holden has been lecturing to the members of the New York produce exchange and telling them what he told the Iowa farmers, that it is worth while to every farmer to take pains in the selection of his seed. Planting the best seed is rewarded when the time comes for gathering the crop. Observation in Iowa has shown that fifteen per cent. of the corn kernels planted are dead before they are sown. It is not difficult to add ten bushels per acre to the production by simply taking care with respect to the seed. Ten bushels more per acre would add nearly a billion bushels to the corn crop. Undoubtedly it pays the farmer to take pains in the selection of seed.

There is something that looks very practical in the plan of the California rat and cat ranch man to feed the carcases of the rats to the cats and the carcases of the cats to the rats, making his profit by marketing the skins. Of course it will be assumed that as the animals increase and multiply, the multiplication of each species will insure the food supply of the other. Isn't it fascinating? And all the time the checks will be coming in for the skins. There is nothing exclusive about this ingenious Californian. He is willing to allow the investing public to purchase some of the shares in his industrial enterprise, which is organised in the form of a stock company.

Among the nations of Europe Turkey is the only one which flies no Red Cross in time of war. Though a party to the Geneva convention, Turkey has steadfastly refused to use the emblem of that convention, the Greek cross, to protect its sick and wounded in time of war, says the Westminster Gazette. In place of the cross the Turkish army medical corps makes use of a red crescent on a white ground, but this departure from the recognized international emblem has never received the sanction of the nations signatory to the Geneva convention. There is little doubt that Italy will look on the crescent as equivalent to the red cross.

A man who shot and killed his brother-in-law while deer hunting is reported to have gone insane after the tragedy. Didn't he go insane before it? Isn't "buck fever" a species of mental alienation which makes many of its victims temporarily unfit to be entrusted with guns?

The New York County Lawyers' association reports that "only 30 per cent. of the lawyers in New York make a fair living." As we suspected, 70 per cent. make an unfair living.

The New York World wants to know "Why is the Tombs full?" Possibly because it took a few too many.

The traveling men say they want the tipping habit stopped in the hotels. Then why don't they stop it?

TAFT FREES MORSE

FORMER BANKER HAS ONLY SIX MONTHS TO LIVE SAYS SURGEON GENERAL.

PROBABLY GO TO CARLSBAD

President Commutes 15-Year Sentence in Effort to Prolong New Yorker's Life, But Refuses to Restore His Civil Rights.

Washington.—The 15-year sentence for the violation of the national banking laws under which Charles W. Morse, the former New York banker, has served two years in the federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., has been commuted by President Taft to expire at once.

The commutation of sentence, which gives Morse his complete freedom—but which, unlike a pardon, does not restore his civil rights—was granted upon recommendation of Attorney General Wickersham and Surgeon General Torney, U. S. A.

The White House statement granting freedom to Morse follows:

The president has commuted the sentence of Charles W. Morse to expire at once. This action was taken upon the recommendation of the attorney general, based upon the following report of Surgeon General Torney:

A careful review of these reports makes it clear to my mind that he is suffering from a combination of diseases due to degenerative changes which are incurable and progressive. The reports show that the condition of the kidneys and the heart are growing worse. I regard the attack of cardiac dyspnoea or heart-block, from which he suffered on the morning of the 15th instant, as an ominous occurrence.

In my opinion the prisoner's duration of life will be in all probability less than one month if kept in confinement, and in the event of his release under commutation of sentence, it is not probable that he will live as long as six months.

The commutation of Morse's sentence came at the end of months of unremitting effort on the part of Mrs. Morse and the banker's friends. Almost since the day the doors of his cell in Atlanta closed upon him Mrs. Morse and influential friends have besieged the department of justice and through it the White House for mitigation of the sentence.

Efforts for a complete pardon were unavailing, and under the law Morse could not be paroled until he had served five years. Under the commutation he will be allowed to leave the army hospital at Fort McPherson, near Atlanta, at once. Recent efforts in his behalf developed the fact that his friends wished to take him to Carlsbad for treatment, and it is deemed probable that he will be taken abroad at once.

STEPHENSON WINS HIS FIGHT

Senate Subcommittee Votes Unanimously That Bribery in Wisconsin Man's Election Is Unproved.

Washington.—Senator Isaac Stephenson was a victor in his fight to hold his seat as senator from Wisconsin when the Heyburn subcommittee, which has been investigating his election, decided by a unanimous vote that the charges of corruption and bribery made against Senator Stephenson had not been proved.

The report has been completed, but its details will be kept secret until it is presented to the senate. It is understood that while the committee acquits Stephenson of the charge of buying his seat, it criticizes him for spending $100,000 in the primary campaign.

Senator Stephenson was elected January 26, 1909, and he has faced three inquiries into his election. The Wisconsin legislature asked the senate to make the present inquiry.

Evidence was brought before the subcommittee that $107,793 had been spent to elect Stephenson and he admitted the expenditure of about that sum. He said the determined campaign by Senator La Follette against his election was the reason for the heavy expense.

Managers of Stephenson's campaign said that $150,000 or $200,000 would have been spent had they made a more systematic campaign.

MANY GREET FARLEY

CARDINAL IS GIVEN GREAT OVATION AT NEW YORK.

Triumphal Return Is Marked by Elaborate Decorations—300,000 Gather at Pier.

New York.—The triumphal return to New York of Cardinal John Murphy Farley was the signal for the greatest ovation that has ever been accorded a man of the church in the United States. Coming back from Rome, where he had been elevated from Archbishop of New York to the highest honor within the grant of the Catholic church, excepting that of the Holy Father, he was the recipient of visible and audible homage such as is seldom paid to any man.

Many of the most prominent figures in the public life of the nation were among these who participated in the welcome to Cardinal Farley, which was not only brilliant, but impressive.

Cardinal Farley.

At Twenty-third street the cardinal's carriage turned into Fifth avenue and proceeded in a direct line to St. Patrick's Cathedral, the curbs on both sides being crowded with members of all the big Catholic societies of Greater New York. Further up the cadet corps of all the Catholic military schools, institutions and organizations of the metropolis lined both sides of Fifth avenue and at the very end of his triumphal march, the cardinal was greeted by his best and most beloved friends, the 90,000 Catholic children attending the parochial schools of Greater New York. This part of the reception seemed to please the cardinal more than any other feature of his welcome.

HARVESTER TRUST IS FLAYED

Representative of Independents Makes Sensational Charges at House Committee Hearing.

Washington.—Sensational charges against the International Harvester company, the so-called "harvester trust," were made before the house rules committee by F. J. Lowe of New York, representing independent manufacturers.

Mr. Lowe told the committee that 51 per cent. of the stockholders in the steel, sugar, beef and bankers' trusts control also the International Harvester company. "We charge that the International Harvester company, through the National City bank of New York, can break any independent concern in the United States," said Mr. Lowe.

The witness said the department of justice had "chloroformed every movement made to prosecute the harvester trust, shown by the fact that the Townsend report to the department in 1906 has slumbered there ever since. The report showed, among other things, that there were thirteen independent harvester concerns in the United States when the International Harvester company was organized. Today there are only two independent concerns in the United States.

Mr. Lowe charged also that the International Harvester company insisted on a profit of 100 per cent. on its goods sold in this country, but that Europe got them almost at cost.

JURY SEES DYNAMITE CODE

'Ping" Letters Direct the Blowing Up of Certain Structures—Facts Given by McNamara.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Telegrams and letters signed "Ping," purporting to contain a code giving instructions about viaducts, bridges and buildings that were to be blown up, were read before the federal grand jury in connection with Ortie McManigal's confession regarding the dynamite conspiracy.

This signature, according to McManigal, was not that of the McNamaras, but was used by another person whom he named.

Because of his belief that "Ping" was receiving $200 for each "job," and was giving him only $125, McManigal says he refused to work with him, and later arranged through John J. McNamara, to do "jobs" with the aid of James B. McNamara.

CUBAN ROW AT END

WARRING FACTIONS SETTLE DIFFERENCES—TAFT THINKS INTERVENTION UNNECESSARY.

REPLY IS EXPECTED SOON

Island Congress Probably Will Modify Laws to Check Veterans' Activities —Official Statement Issued—Reconstruction Period Is On.

Washington. — Secretary of War Stimson declared after a conference with President Taft that he did not believe the United States would need to intervene in Cuba. President Taft, Mr. Stimson said, agreed with him. Although the situation is regarded as most hopeful, the white house and the war department will watch developments closely.

Havana, Cuba. — The reply of the Cuban government to the note of Secretary Knox intimating that the United States government might be compelled to intervene in Cuban affairs probably will be made this week.

An official statement was given out regarding the conference held at the palace between President Gomez and representatives of all the political factions and the veterans. The statement is as follows:

"The meeting terminated with every one breathing words of patriotism, a fact which filled the president with optimism because he found in his old companions in arms and in all the others present a firm determination to save the republic, as might be expected from those professing their love for the Cuban fatherland."

Col. Orestes Ferrara, speaker of the house of representatives, after the conference, said that he was convinced that all the trouble was due to congress truckling to the veterans by abrogating the civil service law.

New York. — An appeal to the American people to be benevolent toward the Cuban republic in its struggle to adjust itself to conditions has been issued here by Gen. Carlos Garcia Velez, the Cuban minister, who is bound for Havana on a leave of absence.

"I do not believe that the United States will intervene in Cuba," said General Garcia. "On the contrary, the American note which has caused such a stir will have the effect of bringing together all the patriotic people of Cuba and such a degree of harmony will ensue as will make talk of intervention idle.

RIOTERS ARE SENT TO CELLS

Striking Workers at Lawrence, Mass., Sentenced to House of Correction on Various Charges.

Lawrence, Mass.—A dozen strikers appeared in the police court to answer charges for rioting, assault with intent to kill, carrying concealed weapons, disturbing the peace and other offenses. Three men were sentenced to the house of correction for terms up to two years.

MANIACS FLEE FIRE

FLAMES SWEEP DUNNING (ILL.) INFIRMARY; 270 SAVED.

Two Insane Turn on Attendant and Fierce Battle on Bridge 50 Feet in Air Ensues.

Chicago.—Insane patients at the Dunning (Ill.) institution were herded together and marched out of the blazing "old infirmary" building just before the structure collapsed.

Supposed to have ignited from a defective flue on the top floor of the main wing, the flames gradually ate their way downward and four hours after the fire was discovered virtually all of a three-wing building, four and five stories high, was in ruins.

The fire was characterized by almost innumerable acts of heroism on the part of underemployes and attendants.

Two patients turned on a guard and struck, bit and kicked him in an effort to drive him away. Failing in this they tried to throw him over the high railing and down to the ground, 50 feet below.

They had succeeded in pushing him to the top of the railing when he broke from their grasp, knocked down one of the men and forced the other into the wing in which he was caring for his quota of patients. Then he carried in the other men, still kicking and biting.

There were 270 insane patients in the institution, all of whom were gotten out without injury.

When some of the patients saw the flames and heard the clanging of the bells on the arriving fire engines they began to fight.

The police, with drawn clubs, helped to form lines of the patients and to keep the violent from committing suicide or injuring those who were trying to save them.

PRIZES FOR SCHOOL PUPILS

National Municipal League Offers Two for Essays on "Street Cleaning in My City."

Philadelphia.—The National Municipal league announces that through the generosity of certain friends it is enabled to offer two prizes to high schools, the first of $30 and the second of $20, for the best two essays on "Street Cleaning in My City."

The essays must not exceed fifteen hundred words in length. They must be clearly written on one side of the sheet only and must be mailed to the secretary of the National Municipal league, Clinton Rogers Woodruff, 703 North American Building, Philadelphia, not later than Feb. 20, 1912. Each essay must have an assumed name at the top of the first page and be accompanied by a sealed envelope bearing within the name, address and class of the competitor, and on the outside of the envelope the assumed name. These envelopes will not be opened until the award of the judges has been made.

FIGHT IN ASUNCION STREETS

Many Are Killed During Battle Between Rebels and Loyalists in Paraguay's Capital.

Buenos Aires, Argentina.—Many were killed in the streets of Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, in fights between adherents of President Liberato Rojas and revolutionists.

Insurgents, however, are still in control of the situation, and all attempts by the government troops to rescue President Rojas, who has been a prisoner in their hands for several days, have proved unsuccessful.

THE PEEVISH CHILD NEEDS TREATMENT

When a child sulks drowsily, or is fretful, it is usually due to some slight disorder of the digestive organs, and a mild laxative is very often all that is necessary to restore cheerfulness and buoyancy of spirits.

In cases where the use of a gentle, effective laxative stimulant is indicated, many of the best physicians are now prescribing Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This preparation is admittedly the perfect laxative, being mild, yet positive in its action on the bowels, and far preferable to violent cathartics and purgative waters. It is very pleasant to the taste and is an ideal remedy to regulate and strengthen the stomach, liver and bowels. Its easy, natural action makes it especially desirable in the case of children, a dose at bed-time being sure to have the desired result next morning, with no attendant unpleasantness or discomfort.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is sold by druggists everywhere in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried this splendid remedy, write to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill., for a sample. He will be very glad to send a trial bottle without any expense to you whatever.

After the Party.

"Well, George, I hope you are pleased with yourself."

"Suffering Samson, what have I done now?"

"Oh, nothing, of course. What did you say to that aristocratic Mrs. Pingleton?"

"Well, what did I say?"

"And right after I warned you against your awful breaks. You said to her: How time flies! I suppose your young hopeful will soon put on long trousers.'"

"Well, what's the matter with that? Friendly, wasn't it?"

"Friendly! Mrs. Pingleton has but one child, and she's a young woman of 20!"

The Thin Girl's Temper.

No thin woman can afford to lose her temper. "Nothing," says a good authority, "will make you so angular or give your face such an undesirable look as the free indulgence of your own will." A girl who was thin to a really painful degree gained 30 pounds in 60 days on the following regime: Twelve hours' sleep a day; a well-ventilated and cold room to sleep in, with plenty of fresh air all night; light down coverlets for warmth and hot-water bags at the feet if they are cold; loose, light clothing at all times, with plenty of space about the chest, shoulders and waist; a diet of cereals, cocoa, fresh fruits or starchy vegetables, potatoes, beans, etc., milk and cream—everything of a warming, fat-producing nature in the way of food; warm baths, though not too frequently.

SURPRISED DOCTOR.

Illustrating the Effect of Food.

The remarkable adaptability of Grape-Nuts food to stomachs so disordered that they will reject everything else, is illustrated by the case of a woman in Racine, Wis.

"Two years ago," she says, "I was attacked by a stomach trouble so serious that for a long time I could not take much of any sort of food. Even the various kinds prescribed by the doctor produced most acute pain.

"We then got some Grape-Nuts food, and you can imagine my surprise and delight when I found that I could eat it with a relish and without the slightest distress.

"When the doctor heard of it he told me to take several small portions each day, because he feared I would grow tired of it as I had of all other food.

"But to his surprise, (and that of everybody else), I did not tire of Grape-Nuts, and became better day by day, till, after some weeks, my stomach entirely recovered and I was able to eat anything my appetite craved.

"My nerves, which had become so weakened that I feared I would become insane, were also restored by the Grape-Nuts food in connection with Postum which has become our table beverage. I appreciate most gratefully and thankfully the good that your food preparations have done me, and shall be glad to answer any letters inquiring as to my experience." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

BUTTER GOES EAST

TWO TOP GRADES OF CREAMERY PRODUCT SENT TO NEW YORK, WHERE IT BRINGS BONUS.

THIRD QUALITY AT HOME

Some of Plants in State Receive Premium on Their Output; One Five Cents More on the Pound.

Minneapolis.—Why isn't Minnesota butter sold in Minnesota?

This is a question frequently asked lately by the bedraggled consumer compelled to pay unusually high prices for the dairy product. F. W. McIntosh, secretary of the dairy and food commission, pointed out some reasons yesterday. Here they are:

The best product of the best creameries of the state is sold in New York at anywhere from 1 to 3½ cents above the New York market quotations, which are from 3 to 4 cents higher than Twin City prices.

Many of the creameries receive this premium for their product f. o. b. at their plants, paying no commission or freight.

Those that pay freight and commission reap a profit from ½ to 2 cents a pound more than they would get in the Twin City market, which amounts to a considerable sum on an output running into the thousands of pounds a year.

New York dealers will buy at these prices all the Minnesota creameries will sell.

Pay 15 Cents More a Pound.

Consequently practically none of the "specials" and "extras," the first two grades of butter made by these creameries, is sold within the state. What the Minnesota consumer buys is the third grade, known as "creamery firsts." New York residents pay on an average 15 cents a pound more for their butter than do those of Minnesota, but when they do they receive the best butter made by the best creameries of the state.

To illustrate further, Mr. McIntosh referred to the statistics of the butter made in 1910, the latest available. Of the 96,000,000 pounds manufactured that year, the co-operative creameries made 80,000,000, practically none of which was sold in the state. Of this 80,000,000, nearly every pound of the first two grades, "specials" and "extras," was shipped to New York. Some of the third grade, the "creamery firsts," was sold in the state.

Wednesday the "specials" sold in New York at wholesale for 41½ and 42 cents, in the Twin City at 38 cents; the "extras" in New York for 40½ and 41, in the Twin City at 35; the "creamery firsts" in New York for 38½ and 39 cents, in the Twin City for 32. On the first grade the seller would make 3½ to 4 cents by shipping to the New York market, 5½ to 6 cents on the seconds, and 6 to 7½ cents on the thirds.

Sells at Higher Prices.

According to Mr. McIntosh those shippers who do not sell their product f. o. b. at their plants pay a 2-cent commission per pound to the New York dealers for handling their product and 1½ cents freight. Their butter always sells at least at the highest price in the market, leaving on Wednesday's quotations a margin of ½ a cent profit per pound on the first grade.

But the first grade product of practically every creamery in the state sells at a premium on the New York market running from 1½ cents to 3½ and 4 cents on the average, while there is one in the southern part of the state that receives a bonus of 5 cents per pound. Two creameries at Albert Lea receive premiums of 8¼ and 3½ cents, while the greater majority receive bonuses ranging from 2 to 3 cents.

These bonuses added to the margin of profit in the New York over the Twin City market show why, in Mr. McIntosh's opinion, Minnesota butter is not sold in Minnesota. There have been some who have asked why the dairy and food commission did not step in and stop the shipments outside the state. The answer is: The United States is an open market.

LAND PAPENTS FOR STATE.

Title to Swamp Selections to Be Issued at Once.

Washington, D. C.—A patent for a list of swamp land selections aggregating several thousand acres will be issued to the state of Minnesota. Attorney General Lyndon A. Smith and Assistant Attorney General Stephenson, with Representative Volstead, were at the land office and secured a promise from Commissioner Dennett that the list would go to the secretary of the interior immediately.

DULUTH HOTEL BURNED

Guests Flee in Light Attire from St. James Hostelry.

Duluth. — At an early hour in the morning the guests at the St. James hotel were forced to make their escape from the building in light attire to escape from the flames.

The roof of the hotel is destroyed and the interior is burned out. It is impossible to get an estimate of the damage. Will probably be about fifteen thousand dollars.

AUTOS AT MILL CITY

Enthusiasts Preparing For Big Time February 17-24.

Minneapolis.—Northwestern motor circles are agog over the plans for the coming automobile show to be held in the National Guard Armory Feb. 17 to 24, by the Minneapolis Automobile Show Association, composed of prominent Minneapolis dealers. Never before has the advance interest been so great and the management feels that it has arranged a motor car exhibit that will merit all the interest of dealers and automobile agents.

Literally hundreds of cars will be seen in the huge armory building, electric and gasoline, pleasure and commercial. Every inch of space was contracted for within half an hour's time on the evening the spaces were allotted. Since that time the management has been obliged to refuse space to nearly a score of firms who were late with their applications. Of all the automobile shows ever held in Minneapolis, experts say this one will be the most comprehensive. Sixty-one complete lines of cars and commercial vehicles will be shown and in some of the lines, a "complete" line calls for six or seven models. Special show cars will be shipped here from Chicago where the manufacturers display them the week previous. This means that people of the northwest will have many of the star attractions of the big Chicago and New York shows.

A sterling scheme of decoration has been arranged and this, together with singing and band concerts will do much to enliven the eight days of the show. Factory representatives from the biggest concerns in the country are coming in large numbers and advance hotel reservations in Minneapolis indicate that there will be several thousand visitors in town for the show.

PLAN BOYS' SESSION

Prominent Educators Will Speak at Y. M. C. A. for Juniors in Winona.

Winona.—W. G. Cartlich, state superintendent of boys' work in Minnesota, is in Winona making plans for the boys' part of the Y. M. C. A. state convention to be held here February 8 to 11. This will open with a boys' banquet on Friday evening, February 9, at the Central Methodist church. President Milo B. Price of Pillsbury academy at Owatonna, will act as toastmaster and several boys will respond to toasts. From 150 to 200 boys are expected to attend.

At the evening session following, at the Y. M. C. A. building, addresses will be made by Prof. L. A. Headley of Carleton college and David R. Porter, international secretary of the Y. M. C. A. high school boys.

Saturday morning Dr. Milo B. Price will speak on "For the Honor of the School," and J. M. Anderson of Minneapolis on "A Man's Job," and David R. Porter on "The Association Boy."

Saturday afternoon Henry Churchill King, president of Oberlin college, will address the boys on "A Fight for Character." This will be followed by three sectional conferences for high school clubs, for church boys' clubs and for leaders.

Saturday and Sunday evenings the boys will join in the main convention sessions.

On Sunday afternoon there will be a big meeting for boys over 15 years of age, to be addressed by David R. Porter on "The Great Challenge."

REJECT AUTO RISK.

Deerfield Mutual Fire Company Against Motor Car Insurance.

Owatonna. — Three hundred members attended the annual meetings of the Deerfield Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance company, and the following officers were elected: President, John Wilkes; vice-president, Peter Eliason; secretary, E. L. Erdman; treasurer; William Mollenhauer; directors, Frank Kuntz and J. C. Peterson.

Whether or not farmers' automobiles should be insured was a question that brought out an interesting debate. Robert Crickmore and M. T. McCrady maintained that automobiles are necessary articles of modern farm life and not a luxury, but their plan was defeated.

DIVORCEE WANTS PAY

For Acting as Housekeeper for Former Husband.

Duluth.—Mrs. Jacob Stuhler, after having obtained a divorce from her husband, Jacob Stahler, and was allowed $50 per month alimony, returned to his house to act as housekeeper and she was to receive $20 per month for her services, according to her complaint in district court, where she is seeking to collect $200 which she claims is due her for such services.

Mrs. Stuhler claims to have ten months' salary coming and that Mr. Stuhler refuses to pay.

JUDGE QUINN DIES IN WEST.

Sat at Hearing of Younger Brothers at Northfield.

Tacoma.—Judge John B. Quinn died of heart failure last night at Aberdeen, Wash., where he moved three years ago. He was born in Ohio 62 years ago.

He was the police judge in Northfield, Minn., at the time of the raid of the Younger brothers on the Northfield bank and bound the prisoners over for trial before a higher court.

GORDON ANNOUNCES.

After a silence of more than a month, Samuel Y. Gordon, lieutenant governor, made a definite announcement that he would be a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota. He said he had prepared a statement to this effect which he would make public some day this week.

TO PROBE WHITE EARTH CASE

TO TAKE TESTIMONY IN MINNEAPOLIS.

Rep. Miller Indignant Because No Republicans Are on Committee.

Washington, D. C. — Chairman Graham of the house committee on expenditures in the interior department announced that the sub-committee given permission by the house to make a first hand investigation of the White Earth situation, will go to Minneapolis at once and immediately commence taking testimony.

Quarters for the hearing have been secured in the Minneapolis federal building. It is the intention of the committee, which will consist of Chairman Graham and Representative Henry George of New York, to hold practically all hearings at Minneapolis.

Republican members of the house are objecting to Chairman Graham's refusal to appoint a Republican member of the committee on the sub-committee and charge that Mr Graham is merely seeking political capital in making the investigation with small intention of getting at the more material facts in the case.

"The Graham investigation," said Representative Miller, "will be an interesting spectacle. Chairman Graham refused to appoint Representative Burke of South Dakota as a member of his sub-committee because Mr. Burke is also a member of the Indian affairs committee and knows something about the Indian situation in the Northwest."

Mr. Miller recently charged that the Graham investigation had been brought about by Special Agent Burch of the department of justice to prevent an investigation of his own alleged mis-administration by the Indian affairs committee.

"This is an investigation," said Mr. Miller, "of Mr. Burch, by Mr. Burch and for Mr. Burch. No others need apply."

Chairman Graham offered to name Representative Mondell of Wyoming on the White Earth committee but Mr. Mondell was unable to accept. Following that Mr. Graham refused to place a Republican on the committee.

DULUTH DANCE HALLS BAD.

Grand Jury in Report to Mayor Recommends Closer Supervision.

Duluth.—The grand jury reported to the mayor the following recommendations:

Closer supervision of dance halls.

A workhouse for short term prisoners.

Revocation of liquor licenses in "dives."

The grand jury in its report, in substance said:

"Young girls are being ruined through attendance at public dance halls.

"Men are being robbed in saloons on the Bowery and St. Croix avenue with the full knowledge of proprietors.

"Saloon keepers countenance 'rolling' of woodsmen.

"Women of the underworld visit dance halls. Youths and girls take intoxicants there."

Range Poultrymen Organize.

Virginia.—Preliminary steps were taken for the organization here of the Range Poultry association. A dozen local poultry fanciers were present. E. F. Kendall was elected president and J. R. Kregdahl secretary.

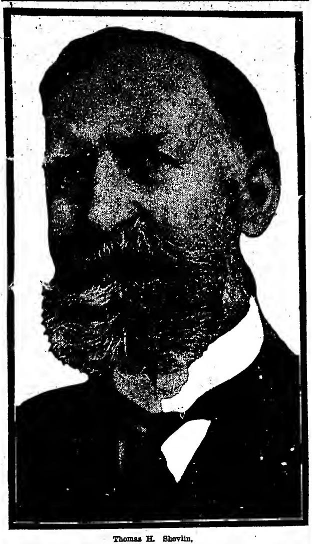
Goulet Held as Murderer.

Albuquerque, New Mexico.—Theodore Goulet of Minneapolis, charged with the murder of Alex Knapp, an Albuquerque policeman, was held to the grand jury without bail. Goulet shot Knapp while the officer was taking him to jail.

Four Bridges Authorized.

Washington, D. C. — Representative Nye has secured the passage by the house of bills authorizing the city of Minneapolis to build four bridges across the Mississippi.

Minneapolis Millionaire Lumberman Is Called



Thomas H. Shevlin,
President of the Shevlin-Carpenter company, who died in Pasadena, Cal.

T. L. SHEVLIN DEAD

Minneapolis Lumberman Expires at Passadena, Cal., Age of 60 Years.

AMASSED A BIG FORTUNE

He Had Been Republican National Committeeman in 1900-1904—Liberal Donor to University of Minnesota.

Minneapolis, Jan. 16. — Thomas Henry Shevlin, president of the Shevlin-Carpenter company, died in Pasadena, Cal. He was 60 years old. It is said his death probably was due to uraemic poisoning. He had been ill for some time before his death and his active interests in business had been assumed by his son, Thomas H. Shevlin.

Mr. Shevlin was taken seriously ill about a year ago and was under the doctor's care until the time of his death. He recently took a trip abroad with Hovey C. Clarke. His death was hastened by the death of his wife in April, 1910. According to his associates in business, Mr. Shevlin had been a different man since her death.

He had been identified for many years with the lumber business. He leaves an estate estimated to be in the neighborhood of $10,000,000.

Thomas Henry Shevlin was born in Albany, N. Y., Jan. 3, 1852 He was the son of John and Matilde Shevlin. His mother survives him. He is survived by three children, Thomas Leonard, Florence and Helen.

Mr. Shevlin's boyhood was spent in Albany. Until he was 15 years old he attended the public schools of that city, acquiring a common school education. He then entered the employ of John McCraw & Co., a lumber firm of Albany, and with them began his training for the business with which he has been identified for years.

He was connected with this firm from 1870 as manager of important interests in several New York towns. He then went to Chicago, going from there to Muskegon, Mich., where he took charge of the lumber interests of R. W. Harvey. About a year later he associated himself with the Stephen C. Hall Lumber company and in 1884 started a branch company in Minneapolis under the name of the North Star Lumber company.

Came to Minneapolis.

He moved to Minneapolis and soon organized the Hall & Ducey company. Upon the withdrawal of Mr. Ducey in 1887 the firm became the Hall & Shevlin Lumber company, and so continued until the death of Mr. Hall in 1888. Three years later Elbert L. Carpenter bought an interest in the business under the firm name of the Shevlin-Carpenter company. The organization then established with Mr. Shevlin as president and has been doing a large business.

Since the establishment of this company, Mr. Shevlin had extended his operations until his interests included timber, lumber and mills in the South, the West and in Canada. With J. Neils he established the J. Neils Lumber company in 1895 with a mill at Sauk Rapids and in 1900 this firm installed a mill at Cass Lake, Minn., with an annual capacity of 50,000,000 feet of lumber. In 1896 he joined Frank P. Hixon in buying a large amount of timber on the Red Lake Indian reservation, forming the St. Hilaire Lumber company and building a mill.

This company bought out the mill, logs, and timber holdings of the Red River Lumber company at Crookston and reorganized as the Crookston Lumber company with Mr. Shevlin as president.

In 1902 and 1903 the company built a mill at Bemidji with an output of 70,000,000 feet a year, running a logging spur east of Red Lake and connecting with the Minnesota and International railway at Hovey Junction, thus opening up a vast tract of hitherto unavailable timber. Mr. Shevlin also was connected with and was active in founding a line of retail yards operated as the St. Hilaire Retail Lumber company, with the Shevlin-Clark company of Ontario and with the Rainy River Lumber company which operates a plant at Rainy River, Ont., with a capacity of 70,000,000 feet—said to be one of the most complete saw mills in the world.

Mr. Shevlin besides being president and organizer of many subsidiary companies, had vast timber holdings in Oregon.

In politics he was Republican and a member of the national committee for Minnesota from 1900 to 1904. In 1901 he served as vice president of the Minnesota State fair, representing Minneapolis on the board of managers. His interest in public affairs and in the institutions of Minneapolis and Minnesota is evidenced in his gift to the University of Minnesota—Alice Shevlin hall, the building for the use and convenience of the women of the institution. In addition to this gift he presented five scholarships in 1909 at $10,000 each.

IOWA WOMAN WELL AGAIN

Freed From Shooting Pains, Spinal Weakness, Dizziness, by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Ottumwa, Iowa.—"For years I was almost a constant sufferer from female trouble in all its dreadful forms; shooting pains all over my body, sick headache, spinal weakness, dizziness, depression, and everything that was horrid. I tried many doctors in different parts of the United States, but Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done more for me than all the doctors. I feel it my duty to tell you these facts. My heart is full of gratitude to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for my health."—Mrs. HARRIET E. WAMPLER, 524 S. Ransom Street, Ottumwa, Iowa.

Consider Well This Advice.

No woman suffering from any form of female troubles should lose hope until she has given Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a fair trial.

This famous remedy, the medicinal ingredients of which are derived from native roots and herbs, has for nearly forty years proved to be a most valuable tonic and invigorator of the female organism. Women everywhere bear willing testimony to the wonderful virtue of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

Splendid Crops
In Saskatchewan (Western Canada)
800 Bushels from 20 acres of wheat was the thresher's return from a Lloydminster farm in the season of 1910. Many fields in that as well as other districts yielded from 25 to 35 bushels of wheat to the acre. Other grains in proportion.

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

LARGE PROFITS are thus derived from the FREE HOMESTEAD LANDS of Western Canada.

This excellent showing causes prices to advance. Land values should double in two years' time. Grain growing, mixed farming, cattle raising and dairying are all profitable. Free Homesteads of 160 acres are to be had in the very best districts; 160 acre pre-emptions at $3.00 per acre within certain areas. Schools and churches in every settlement, climate unexcelled, soil the richest; wood, water and building material plentiful.

For particulars as to location, low settlers' railway rates and descriptive illustrated pamphlet, "Last Best West," and other information, write to Sup't of Immigration, Ottawa, Canada, or to Canadian Government Agent.

Senator Moonan, of Waseca is out with an artical in the Minneapolis Journal defending the so called "seven senator" amendment to the State Constitution. There is a wide difference of opinion on this question but it will narrow down to [illegible] of the country vs the big cities before the next election.

The water famine along Red Lake River is becoming desperate, as the river no longer flows, and the farmers have to depend on melting snow for their stock. All of these facts are now before the war department at Washington, with plenty of evidene that the water has been shut off by log jams. We shall await the result of last weeks investigations, before expressing an opinion.

At much less expense than that of conducting hearings at Thief River Falls Crookston and Grand Forks, the government could have sent one competent engineer to the sourse of the Red Lake river and secured much more valuable information.—Red Falls Gazette.

That is just what they do not dare to do. The government engeneers know them logs are there and were put there by the lumber companys and that they have shut off Red Lake River.

DIFFERENT REPORTS.

That we made no mistake in going to Crookston to make our report on the present condition of Red Lake and Red Lake River, is shown by the following report published in the Thief River Falls Times.

"There were affidavits on both sides of the controversy as to whether the lake is higher or lower and as to whether the low water caused the jaming of the logs. It was definitely shown that the lake is one inch lower now than it was in September."

The above is the Thief River Falls report. Now let us see the difference at Crookston. A written letter from the state drainage Egineer George Ralph was introduced which shows that the lake is now one foot higher than it was last summer. Mr. Ralph has just completed surveys and taken levels of the lake and knows what he is talking about.

The hearing at Crookston was fair and the people had a chance to be heard. It took us over an hour to explain what we knew about the treatment of settlers living along this river by the lumber companys, and of conditions as they are to day.

When the government agent, O'Brien sold us these lands he often spoke of the advantages of owning land along this river, for the reason that we would not have drainage taxes to pay and would always be sure to have water for stock. Now the government has allowed the lumber companys to close up this river with logs, shut it off and dry it up, and when the people make complaint the lumber companys hire teams and men and send up to the outlet and repot that Red Lake has gone dry.

The meeting at Thief River Falls was held in the interest of the lumber companys, but the "foxey" Major heard something drop when he reached Crookston, and discoverd how fast the level of Red Lake had risen since he left Thief River Falls.

The Spirit of the Age.

He had earned a hundred dollars,
And he got it in a lump.
He, you understand, was married.
Home his hundred bones he carried,
Nor upon the way there tarried—
He went to it on the jump.

To his wife he showed the money,
And they counted it with care.
She could hardly keep from crying
As the dollars she stood eying
Where before her they were lying,
All untarnished yet and fair.

Then she turned and kissed her hubby,
And she said: "You darling man!
To the neighbors let us show it,
So that they shall surely know it;
Then let's hurry out and blow it
In as quickly as we can."

On the call of the county auditor, pursuant to chapter 230 of the laws of 1905, and acts amendatory thereof, the board of county commissioners of Pennington county, Minn., met in special session in the office of the county auditor in the city of Thief River Falls, Minn., at 3 o'clock p. m., December 27, A. D. 1911, for the purpose of hearing and considering the petition of L. C. Fevig and others for a public drainage ditch located wholly within the county of Pennington, State of Minnesota and for the purpose of transacting such further business as may legally come before said board.

Meeting called to order by the chairman at 1 o'clock p. m.

Members present, Aubol, Shaw, Larson, Hedeen, Wold.

Members absent, none.

The petition of L. C. Fevig and others for a county ditch in said county was presented to the board and read, and the board being satisfied that all the conditions of chapter 230 of the laws of 1905, and acts amendatory thereof, had been complied with, on motion duly made and carried unanimously the following resolution appointing an engineer to survey the route of said proposed ditch was adopted.

RESOLUTION APPOINTING ENGINEER IN DITCH PROCEEDINGS.

In the matter of the petition of L. C. Fevig and others for locating and constructing county ditch No. 57 in the county of Pennington, state of Minnesota.

State of Minnesota, county of Pennington, ss.

Whereas, A petition bearing date the 10th day of July, 1911, signed by L. C. Fevig, H. Tiedemann, Ole P. Borstad, Nels N. Graue, Gunder C. Hanson, Carl P. Anderson, Gilbert Hanson Rasmus Ed. Martinson, Demsey, Ben Rendal, Ole G. Hanson, praying for the establishment of a certain drainage ditch in said county, designated and numbered by the county auditor as county ditch No. 57, the route of which is more fully described in said petition, and a proper bond accompanying the same, have been filed with the county auditor of said county, a by law required:

And Whereas, It appears by satisfactory proof to the board of county commissioners of Pennington county, that due notice of the pendancy of said petition, and the time and place at which the same would be heard, has been given as required by law:

Now, Therefore, We, the board of county commissioners of said county, at a special session held this day, do hereby appoint C. H. Martz as a competent and experienced engineer to make an accurate survey of the line of the line of said proposed ditch from source to its outlet, as provided and specified in and by chapter 230 of the general laws of 1905, and acts amendatory thereof, and after completing his duties as such engineer to make and file his report with the county auditor of said county, on or before the 20th day fo January, 1912.

Dated December 27, 1911.

By the Board, ED. A. AUBOL.
Chairman Board County Commissioners of Pennington county.

Attest:
A. H. FASEL, (SEAL)
County Auditor.

On motion duly made and carried unanimously, the following order appointing viewers on county ditch No. 57 was made

ORDER APPOINTING VIEWERS.

In the matter of the petition of L. C. Fevig and others for county ditch No. 57 in the county of Pennington, state of Minnesota:

State of Minnesota, county of Pennington ss.

Whereas, A petition bearing date the 10th day of July A. D. 1911, signed by L. C. Fevig and others praying for the establishment of a ditch in said county, designated and numbered by the county auditor as county ditch No. 57 the route of which is fully described in said petition, together with a proper bond accompanying the same, has been filed with the county auditor of said county; and said county auditor has given due notice of the pendency of said petition, and the said notice has been published and served as by law required; and hearing had on said petition pursuant to said notice; and the said county board of said county have heretofore duly appointed a competent engineer, towit, C. H. Martz, to make a survey of said ditch

Now Therefore, We, the county board of said county, at a special session held this day, do hereby appoint Alfred Hammerstenn and G. K. Haavi and R. M. Johnson, three resident freeholders of said county, who are not interested in the construction of said proposed work, and not of kin to any of the parties known to be interested therein, to be viewers of said proposed work and of the route thereof. The said viewers shall first take an oath to faithfully perform their duties as such viewers; and thereafter, having received a certified copy of the petition for said ditch and of the order appointing them such viewers and the order of the county auditor of said county designating the time and place of the first meeting of said viewers, shall meet at the time and place specified in the order of the county auditor aforesaid and shall proceed to view said proposed work, and the land damaged or benefited thereby; and, having completed said view and examination of said work, shall make and file their report thereof with said county auditor of said county within thirty days from the date of their first meeting. In said report they shall in tabular form give the names of of the owners of each tract of land to be benefited or damaged by said proposed work, the description of each tract of land to be benefited or damaged (said names of owners to be the same as appear on the county tax duplicates of said county, and the description to be given in legal form), and the total number of acres in each of said tracts, the estimated number of acres in each tract of land to be benefited or damaged (as the the case may be), the number of acres added to any tract by the total or partial drainage of any meandered lake, or the change of any water course and the location and value of such added land; the damage, if any, to riparian rights pertaining to any tract, and the amount that each tract of land will be benefited or damaged by the construction of said work. In case said ditch drains, either in whole or in part any public or corporate road or railroad or benefits any such road so that the roadbed or traveled track of any such road will be made better by the construction of said ditch, said viewers shall estimate the benefits arising therefrom to said road, roadbeds or railroads and report said benefits, together with the names of roads and other particulars necessary to indentify the corporations, private or public, to be benefited thereby, and amounts of benefits to each; they shall report as part of such tabular statement the damages awarded to each municipal or other corporation for injury to any road or roadbed, and from the necessary construction and maintenance of any bridge, culverts or other works rendered necessary by the establishment of such ditch, stating the same separately. They shall also report the total estimated benefits in respect to said ditch entire and branches thereof, if any, and also whether or not, in their opinion, the estimated expense of the construction of said ditch, including the damages assessed therefor, is greater than the utility of said proposed ditch; and whether or not said proposed ditch is impracticable for any reason, and if so, stating the reason why it should not be constructed. In making said view and survey of said proposed work and their report thereon, the said viewers shall proceed according to chapter 230 of the general laws of 1905.

The County Board of Pennington County, Minnesota, by ED. A. AUBOL, Chairman.

Dated this 27th day of December, A. D. 1911.

Attest: (SEAL)
A. H. FASEL, County Auditor.

In the matter of the repair of Rocksbury and North ditch No. 1, also designated as county ditch No. 6, the following resolution was offered by Commissioner Wold, duly seconded by Commissioner Larson:

Whereas, The engineer in charge having examined the work and has filed his acceptance of job on the above said ditch with the county auditor:

Now Therefore, Be it resolved that the sum of one hundred fifty dollars $150.00) be allowed to G. K. Haavi (contractor) as a partial estimate; the balance due to be paid to contractor when said ditch has been inspected and accepted by the county board.

Resolution prevailed.

The following resolution was offeaed by Commissioner Shaw, who moved its adoption, duly seconded by Commissioner Hedeen:

Whereas, At a public sale of digging and constructing a public ditch, designated and numbered as Judicial ditch No. 18, between Marshall and Pennington counties, held on the 30th day of August A. D. 1910, the contract for constructing said ditch and leveling of said roads thereon were duly sold to the Northwestern Drainage Co., which company has made a contract with said counties of Marshall and Pennington, state of Minnesota, bearing date of the 30th day of August A. D. 1910, to construct the same, and

Whereas, All of the said contract relating to the excavation of said ditch is substantially completed, and

Whereas, The leveling of the highway along said ditch is complete with the exception of thirty per cent and the sum of approximately $12,000.00 is due the contractor on the excavation, exclusive of all road leveling.

Now Therefore Be It Resolved, That a payment in the sum of $11,952.70 on said ditch contract be made the Northwestern Drainage Co., the contractor, and that the county auditor's warrant for the Pennington county's apportionment of said $11,952.70 be issued, and delivered to said contractor upon the delivery to said auditor of a bond in the sum of $12,000.00, conditioned according to law as in the case of an original contractor's bond, and further conditioned for the full completion of said contract on or before September first, 1912: said bond and sureties thereon to be approved by the county auditor of Pennington county.

Resolution declared carried.

On motion duly carried the board took a recess until 7 o'clock p. m.

Woke Up And Found Himself Famous.

An amsing incident happened at the log jam meeting at Thief River Falls last week which we quote from the Thief River Falls Press:

"After a couple of hours discussion a motion was made by Andrew Troveton and seconded by D.N. Winton that the meeting request Col. Shunk to use his influence toward securing a lock and dam at the lake outlet and to improve the river and keep it strictly under goverment control to the end that these conditions may never again prevail.

This motion was unanimously carried."

WONDERFUL ECHOES.

Effect Produced by a Pistol Shot at a Lake in Bavaria.

Probably the finest echo which the world knows is in the cathedral at Pisa, where the leaning tower is. Sing two notes and there is no reverberation. Sing three and they are at once taken up by the walls of the edifice, swelled, prolonged and varied till they seem as a divine harmony from some majestic organ.

There is a cavern in Finland in which, if you test your lungs to the top of their capacity, there will answer you such horrible roarings, moanings and mutterings that you will be glad to rush out in absolute terror.

The cutting down of trees in a certain locality on the Hudson river spoiled a splendid echo. A word shouted there was repeated forty-two times.

Undoubtedly the most extraordinary natural echo in the world is to be heard by the side of a small lake in Bavaria. On one hand rises a perpendicular cliff several thousand feet high, while on the other side is a dense forest. If a pistol is fired on the lake the woods send back a faint echo that gradually dies away, but presently it is heard from the cliff, continually increasing in power till it bursts over one's head like a deafening peal of thunder.—Pearson's Weekly.

Violins Old and New.

There is a general impression that very old violins and violoncellos are much superior in tone to similar instruments of modern construction. The point was debated by a number of Paris musicians, who decided in favor of the modern instruments. Six ancient violoncellos were chosen, including a Stradivarius, a Theckler, a Cappa, a Pressenda and a Guarnerius, together with six modern instruments. These were played alternately by Senor Casals, who was hidden from sight, the instruments being indicated to the jury by a number and marks awarded according to beauty of tone. The modern instruments aggregated 1,484 marks and the ancient instruments only 883, although the six ancient 'cellos represented a value of £6,000 and the modern ones £160.—London Express.

A Paraphrase.

"What is the meaning of that quotation, 'There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may?'"

"Well," replied Senator Sorghum, "the proposition is something like this: It's easy enough to pass a law, but you don't know what it's going to be till the supreme court gets through with it."—Washington Star.

His Vulnerable Spot.

Nothing quite so flatters the indolent man as to be told that he's overworked.—New York World.

At Last.

"Bill," said his long suffering sweetheart, "I'm tired of your shiftless ways. Got a job yet?"

"Nope," he grunted; "I'm still waitin' fur somethin' to turn up."

"Well, here it is, Bill. Take a good look at it and clear out."

Whereupon she turned up her nose at him.—Chicago Tribune.

It All Depends.

MECCA THE SACRED.

A Shrine That Draws One-seventh of the Human Race.

Although one of the most inaccessible cities on earth, Mecca each year has visitors in such numbers that it must be ranked in this particular with London and New York. Even the world's metropolis on the Thames can boast no such cosmopolitan character as is imparted to this mysterious city in the wilderness of Arabia by the myriads of pilgrims who at the cost of incredible pains annually crowd into its confines.

This city is the oldest place of resort in existence, yet of all the millions who have visited it not a score of Christians are known to have come out alive. No flag of citizenship would save a man's life were he known to be a Christian within the sacred precincts of the city where the prophet himself decreed that no unbeliever should set foot.

Of the 225,000,000 Moslems in the world only 15,000,000 live under the Turkish flag, yet most of them acknowledge the sultan of Turkey as their caliph, the successor of the prophet. As Mohammed shrewdly foresaw, the Mecca pilgrimage binds together his disciples into a unity which could be effected in no other way.

"Mecca," says Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer of Arabia, "has become the religious capital and the center of universal pilgrimage for one-seventh of the human race."—Harper's Magazine.

THE ROCK PTARMIGAN.

A Bird of Storms and Ice, Raw Mists and Bleak Winds.

In order to make the acquaintance of the ptarmigan it is necessary either to journey into the snows and ice of the far north or to climb up to the very highest glacier valleys among the frozen peaks of the Rockies or Cascades, where circumpolar conditions are reproduced. While this curious bird is essentially a subarctic type, it is occasionally found among the isolated fields of eternal snow as far south as Colorado and northern New Mexico.

The rock ptarmigan is a bird of storms and ice and raw mists and bleak winds, in the summer gray as the rocks among which he lives, in winter white as the whirling snows in the midst of which he survives after every other feathered living thing, save only the fearless eagle, has fled to the lower valleys.

His brother, the willow ptarmigan, lives lower down by 500 or 1,000 feet, among the dwarfed shrubs which mark the upper edges of tree life, and, while similar in size and structure, is of a less somber plumage and more friendly disposition than the ghostly gray specter of the upper world, the rock ptarmigan. The males of the willow ptarmigan especially are beautiful birds, brownish gray upon the backs and wings, with rich reddish brown throats almost chestnut in color and dazzling white breasts.—Country Life in America.

THE HOME LIFE OF THE SETTLER

WESTERN CANADA AFFORDS ALL THE COMFORTS AND MANY OF THE LUXURIES.

A young lady of Wisconsin secured a certificate at the Milwaukee office of the Canadian Government, and on presenting this to the ticket agent of the railway at the Canadian boundary line she secured a ticket at a reduced rate which carried her to Edmonton, Alberta, from which point, about forty miles, she had friends. This was a couple of years ago, and the young lady is now married to one of the promising young farmers of the district.

In writing of her trip to the Milwaukee representatives of the Canadian Government she says: "I enjoyed my trip up here very much, and expect to go out to our homestead in the Pembina district next spring." To the housewife the information that she has "put up twelve quarts of raspberries" is important, as they "picked them themselves," and they might have picked ten times the quantity if they had required them, for there is no country where wild fruit grows in such abundance. The letter goes on to say, and this is interesting from a woman's standpoint, "the country is very beautiful." Speaking of the friends with whom she went up to live, she says: "They certainly have a beautiful farm and house"—they had been there about four years, also going from Wisconsin—"they have about twenty acres of oats and barley, five acres alfalfa, three acres potatoes and I don't know how many of vegetables. I think they have about forty acres under cultivation altogether. They are now draining a slough which they will afterwards plow and put into fall wheat. They also have a large herd of cattle, and Mrs. C. has about 100 chickens. They make on an average of 30 pounds of butter every week. I never saw such grand cream."

Now these people are enjoying life in Alberta; they have a splendid climate, excellent prospects, and are happy that they are part and parcel in the working out of the upbuilding of a new country, that will take its place amongst the progressive countries of the century. Numbers of letters that express satisfaction as extreme as the one quoted appear in literature sent out by the Canadian Government and which may be had on application to any of its agents.

DISFIGURED WITH CRUSTS

"Some time ago I was taken with eczema from the top of my head to my waist. It began with scales on my body. I suffered untold itching and burning, and could not sleep. I was greatly disfigured with scales and crusts. My ears looked as if they had been most cut off with a razor, and my neck was perfectly raw. I suffered untold agony and pain. I tried two doctors who said I had eczema in its fullest stage, and that it could not be cured. I then tried other remedies to no avail. At last, I tried a set of the genuine Cuticura Remedies, which cured me of eczema when all else had failed, therefore I cannot praise them too highly.

"I suffered with eczema about ten months, but am now entirely cured, and I believe Cuticura Remedies are the best skin cure there is." (Signed) Miss Mettie J. Shaffer, R. F. D. 1, Box 8, Dancy, Miss., Oct. 27, 1910.

"I had suffered from eczema about four years when boils began to break out on different parts of my body. It started with a fine red rash. My back was affected first, when it also spread over my face. The itching was almost unbearable at times. I tried different soaps and salves, but nothing seemed to help me until I began to use the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. One box of them cured me entirely. I recommended them to my sister for her baby who was troubled with tooth eczema, and they completely cured her baby." (Signed) Mrs. F. L. Marberger, Drehersville, Pa., Sept. 6, 1910.

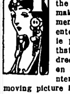
WORK BEHIND the SCENES



IT is the beauty and perfection of modern stage pictures, quite as much as the art of the singers, the musicians, the actors and the actresses that make for the enjoyment of present-day entertainments. Yet it is pretty safe to say that not one in a hundred of us who enjoys an evening at the theater, the opera or the moving picture hall ever bestows a passing thought upon the time and work and money that is represented by the setting of a pleasing "scene." Yet it is in this rather than in any other phase of the entertainment world that we find the evidence of twentieth century progress. Our grandfathers and our great-great-grandfathers may possibly have seen acting as good as any we may witness today, but assuredly they never beheld the make-believe stories enacted before such marvelous backgrounds.

It is indeed a far cry from the days of long ago when the player folk, having no scenery whatever, had to content themselves with draperies and common boards, to the current stage spectacles wherein it puzzles the spectator to determine what is real and what is artificial. Yet as a matter of fact, modern stage scenery, for all that it is so important, is only one of several factors in the creation of the masterly stage pictures of this age. Quite as important are the "properties,"—the furniture, the art objects and the thousand and one other things (not painted, but real) which have places in the stage counterfeits of gardens and palaces and temples and prisons. Even the lighting facilities play an important part. Possibly you can remember the time when the only lighting effects in the theater were found in the burning of "red fire" when Little Eva went to heaven. Now we behold elaborate systems of special lamps and colored globes that reproduce the effect of dawn, sunset, twilight and moonlight, to say nothing of the glare of the noonday sun.

And, as has been hinted, all this challenging of nature costs a pretty penny. Indeed, the modern manager will often spend as much on a single "production" as would have sufficed to pay all the expenses of a theater for an entire year in the old times. An expenditure of $100,000 on painted canvas and tinsel and gilt and costumes is nothing unusual ere the public gets so much as a peep at the gorgeous array, and then when the manager undertakes to transport all this paraphernalia from city to city he finds that he must needs charter special baggage cars, which adds to the expense. Then, too, much time is required to produce such stage pictures. The player folk and the opera singers enjoy long vacations in the summer time, but the scene painters and the "property" manufacturers and the costume makers are never idle. Why, only recently one big firm in New York spent three years in preparation for a stupendous stage spectacle and they even sent their scene painters to the heart of the African desert in order that they might study the sand wastes they were to depict on canvas.

The painting of the scenery might be designated the first step in the preparation for a theatrical or operatic production, as it is, in point of magnitude, one of the most important. The biggest undertakings in scene painting are those in preparation for productions of grand opera as given in our largest cities. The explanation is simple—the grand opera house stages are so much larger than the stages of ordinary theaters or auditoriums that infinitely greater expanses of canvas are necessary to fill the space. Why, just by way of illustration it may be noted that the painted palace which is so conspicuous in the opera "Aida" is sixty-six feet long and thirty-six feet wide. The monster picture of the harbor of Nagasaki, Japan, which forms the background for scenes in the operatic version of "Madam Butterfly" measures 2,700 square feet.

There are many preliminaries connected with scene painting, for the managers and directors of opera and playhouses must approve of the designs and color schemes of the stage pictures ere the painters are allowed to proceed with the execution of the work. In order that his ideas may be approved in advance the head scene painter prepares preliminary sketches just as a portrait painter submits a rough outline sketch to give his subject an idea of the pose he has adopted. The first sketch of a theatrical scene or drop curtain is executed in water colors on a sheet of paper not one-thousandth as large as the original will be, but it nevertheless gives an idea of the arrangement and coloring and enables the director to indicate to the scene painter whether or not he desires any changes made in the plan.

With his water color sketches duly approved the chief of the corps of scene painters proceeds to construct a miniature working model of the complete "set" which he is to evolve. This model, which is for all the world like the toy theaters that are the delight of children, is a big improvement over the water color sketches because it is in effect a working model and not merely a small-scale picture. The latter would be all right as a guide if the task in hand was the painting of a drop curtain or other flat surface, but a stage "set," it will be understood, comprises not a uniform surface of that kind, but is made up of a number of different pieces of scenery, of different types, which are to be placed on the stage at different angles to one another. There is the "drop" or curtain which forms the background of the whole picture and there are also ceilings and "wings" and mayhap even make-believe houses or trees to be set out in the middle of the stage. Now it goes without saying that these different units can be fashioned in proper relation to one another only when the scene makers have a tiny fac-simile to serve as a guide.

There are two different "schools" or methods of scene painting in vogue at the great studios which are maintained as adjuncts of America's leading homes of the drama and of music. Under one plan the scenic artists with their helpers and paint-mixers, stand on what is known as a "scene painting bridge." This bridge, hemmed in on either hand with a great expanse of canvas undergoing decoration, presents, at first glance, merely the appearance of a long narrow room, but upon closer inspection it is seen that the floor where the painters stand is in reality a bridge supported at the ends just as is any suspension bridge. On either side of the bridge one may look down into a great well or abyss and it is into this seemingly bottomless pit that the scenery in the making is lowered as the artists on the bridge complete the decoration of one section of the surface and are ready to turn their paint brushes to a fresh surface. The advantage of such an arrangement, it will be understood, is that it permits work on the largest expanse of canvass without the necessity of folding or rolling up the monster cloth—something that would be disastrous to a coating of wet paint even if it were not objectionable for other reasons.

The second plan of creating stage pictures is known in the profession as painting "on the flat." Under this system the expanse of canvas is not suspended in mid-air as is done before a "bridge," but is stretched on the floor of the studio—a specially constructed building with a floor more than two hundred feet in length. In wielding his paint brushes the artist literally walks over the field of operations, taking care of course to complete the decoration as he progresses so that he will not have to retrace his steps. Whichever method of decoration be employed the painting of the canvas is only a part of the work of preparing scenery. Frames of wood must be carefully and accurately prepared to support the various set pieces and a dozen men are all the while busily engaged in a perfectly appointed carpenter shop preparing these fantastic-shaped backs for the pictures,—the part the public never sees. There are many supplementary operations, too, including the delicate one of sawing out the outline of foliage or stone walls or roofs after the painted canvas has been mounted on the wooden frames.

Extreme versatility is the first requirement of the men who manufacture theatrical and operatic "properties," for they may be called upon at short notice to fashion anything from the "calf of gold" to a bunch of flowers or from a royal throne to a child's doll. Wood and paper and plaster are employed for most of these stage adjuncts, for it is desirable that they be of light weight, though fairly durable. The statues, etc., are all molded in plaster and incidently it may be remarked that some of these stage sculptors are men of exceptional ability. The costume department is another institution "behind the scenes" that contributes to our modern stage pictures and the great opera houses now have not only dressing-making establishments of their own, but jewelry shops, armor makers, who fashion the helmets and coats of mail, and, finally, special bootmakers, who are adepts in making the fancy shoes and slippers that in stage productions reproduce the footgear of all ages. Finally the electricians lend a hand in completing the average stage picture. On the stage of an up-to-date city theater there are as many as 5,000 incandescent electric lights, to say nothing of "spot lights," that resemble searchlights, and this electric system must be supplied with different colored globes in order to carry out the effect of the white light of mid-day, the ruddy glow of the sunset hour and the pale blue brilliance of the moonlight.

Divide Into Two Camps on the Question of History of the Earliest Known Americans.

"How long were the ruins of the southwest inhabited? and, how dense was the population in ancient times? Some of the best archeologists have strongly insisted that appearances are deceiving. The hundreds, and indeed thousands, of sites of ancient villages in Colorado, the Texan Panhandle, Utah, New Mexico and Arizona, as well as in similar parts of northern Mexico, were not all inhabited at one time, so they tell us. Most represent more temporary stopping places where migratory bands of a people supposed to have been ancestors of the Indians settled for a few years and then moved on. At the outside limit, so say these archeologists, the entire population never amounted to more than a few score thousands, whose civilization was of the lowest and most insignificant type. Other students, fewer in number than the orthodox school, hold that the majority of the ruins were all occupied at the same time and for century after century. They say that the population of the arid southwest must have amounted to many hundred thousands—decidedly more in all probability than the country supports today. Furthermore, if this were so, although the type of civilization may have been most primitive compared with ours, yet it was by no means so low as that of the modern Indians. It must have been of the same grade as that of early Babylonia, Egypt, Palestine or Greece before the art of writing was invented. People who could dwell peacefully for centuries in large, permanent communities, and could build great communal houses and long systems of canals, were by no means untutored savages. Civil order and submission to the will of the majority must have been as well developed among them as among us. Such a view leads one to believe that, if only we could trace it, the history of the primitive Americans would prove quite as interesting, and to us possibly more interesting than that of the early oriental peoples to whom our scholars devote so much time and our millionaires so much money.—Harper's.

See Value of Open-Air Schools.

During the year 1911 the greatest percentage of increase among the different forms of anti-tuberculosis work was among the open-air schools for anemic and tuberculosis children. On January 1, 1911, there were only 29 open-air schools in operation or provided for in the entire country. On January 1, 1912, there were 91, an increase of 214 per cent. Sixty-two new schools have been established or provided for this past year. This entire number of open-air schools have been established since January 1, 1907.

An Every-Day Creed.

I desire to radiate health, cheerfulness, sincerity, calm courage and good will. I wish to live without hate, whim, jealousy, envy or fear. I wish to be simple, honest, natural, frank, clean in mind and clean in body, unaffected, ready to say "I do not know" if so it be, to meet all men on an absolute equality, to face any obstacle and meet every difficulty unafraid and unabashed. I wish others to live their lives, too, up to their highest, fullest and best. To that end I pray that I may never meddle, dictate, interfere, give advice that is not wanted, nor assist when my services are not needed. If I can help people I'll do it by giving them a chance to help themselves; and if I can uplift or inspire let it be by example. The RING and the MAN

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

ILLUSTRATIONS BY DEARBORN MELVILL

COPYRIGHT 1909 BY BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

A foolish young tenderfoot becomes fascinated with the bold, artful wife of a drunken prospector in a western mining town. They prepare to elope in a blinding blizzard but are confronted by the maudlin husband. He is shot by the wife, but the chivalrous boy pins a note to the body taking the crime upon himself. In their flight to the railroad station the woman's horse falls exhausted; the youth puts her on his own and follows hanging to the stirrup strap. Seeing he is an impediment, the woman thrusts her escort into a snow drift and rides on. Half-frozen he stumbles into the railroad station just as the train bears the woman away. Twenty-five years later, this man, George Gormly, is a multi-millionaire in New York. He meets Eleanor Haldane, a beautiful and wealthy settlement worker, and co-operates with her in her work. Gormly becomes owner of a steamship line and finds himself frustrated in pier and track extension plans by grafting aldermen, backed by the Gotham Traction company. An automobile accident brings the Haldanes to his country home. Gormly announces that he will be mayor of New York and redeem the city from corruption. The political declaration of the merchant prince produced a tremendous sensation. The whole machinery of the city's detective force is to be used to dig up something damaging to Gormly. The press heretofore unanimously favorable to the merchant candidate, under pressure, divides and the campaign waxes warm. A resolution is introduced granting a gratuitous renewal of the traction franchise. Gormly offers ten million dollars for the franchise. Miss Haldane congratulates Gormly on what she terms a new Declaration of Independence, and he makes an unexpected declaration of love. He is shocked by the confirmation of his suspicions that her father is the head and backbone of the notorious traction company which he is attempting to overthrow. Young Haldane discovers his father's connection with the Gotham Traction company, and is incensed. In an interview between Gormly and Haldane the latter practically offers his daughter's hand as a bribe for Gormly to withdraw. Gormly refuses. In an interview with Gormly Miss Haldane learns of her father's baseness though Gormly vainly tries to hide it. Members of the Ring find the woman for whose sake Gormly declared himself a murderer and decide to force him to withdraw under threat of prosecution. The chief of police visits Gormly, who makes a full confession of the truth. Young Haldane runs the gauntlet of the police and carries the confession to the newspapers for publication. By accident the newspapers find Bill Hamilton, one of the men who were at "Camp Kill Devil" and knew the truth about Gormly.

"Good!" exclaimed the editor.

"That ain't all," said Colonel Bill triumphantly. "I got here a signed paper witnessed before Justice of the Peace Jennings, the only one we had, and signed by me and several other men, which swears they heerd Breeden say his wife killed him and that they seen this thirty-two bullet took out of his breast, the autopsy bein' public like the fun'ral. And it's made out in due form."

"It's quite satisfactory," said the editor, glancing at it and passing it over to Shaw.

"So you see we fellers kind o' thought Fordyce done a man's part in takin' the blame on hisself, and I always kept these things. I thought they might turn up handy sometime."

"You did well."

"And that ain't all either," said Col. Bill Hamilton.

"What more have you?"

"Well, I've seen the woman. She's alive yet."

"Naturally she must have been or they couldn't have got this story from her," was the answer.

"Course. Well, the end of the story's this: Them people plunged south in that blizzard. We looked for 'em in the spring; but never expected to find their remains, 'cause it was more'n human flesh could stand, such a storm as that, and we naturally s'posed they'd both died and got et up by the wolves when they was partly thawed out. But the other night I was takin' a trip through the tenderloin—for observation purposes," said Colonel Bill as the ghost of a smile flickered on the face of the night editor—"and I seen this woman and had an interview with her. She's plumb scared to death. The chief of police who got this stuff from her 's frightened her out of her boots. But I, bein' an old friend of hers, managed to calm her down, and I got her to give me her story. She's always been sorry that she served Fordyce the way she done.

"I don't know how it is, but somehow I got at the good side of her. You see these women are going straight to hell perhaps—although I ain't got no inside information as to that—but however low they git and however bad they are, there's always a soft spot in 'em somewhere. They're women still. And I guess I must've touched the soft spot in her somehow or other; for she told me the truth. At any rate she confessed the whole thing to me, and she said furthermore than when them two was goin' south in the storm, her horse fell down and died, and that Fordyce got off his horse and she mounted it, and he walked hisself hangin' to the saddle strap, and she said that seein' that the remainin' bronco was givin' out too, she shoved Fordyce down and galloped away and left him. And I get her signature to a paper confessin' it."

Again Colonel Bill had recourse to the tin box.

"Here it is. Now if them don't make a complete case for my old friend, I don't know what else to do."

"Where's the woman?" asked the editor, after he had examined the last paper that Colonel Bill had submitted.

"Well, you won't find her," said the old miner slowly. "She's pulled up stakes and hit the trail. I helped her, and I don't mind sayin' that I said I'd see her through this thing. I don't believe she could be caught where she's gone. I don't b'lieve there'll be any pursuit made after her; but if she is, she's got to be let go. Pete Breeden was a dog if ever there was one, and he deserved all he got. That's all, I guess. Gosh! I'm dry!"

"Mr. Abbott," said the editor, "will you procure such refreshments as Colonel Hamilton is accustomed to take under such circumstances?"

"You know the dope, boy. I want it straight too. Same's we had the other night."

"Yes, sir," answered the reporter. "I'll have it here in a minute."

"Now, Colonel Hamilton," said the editor, "you have rendered the people of New York, Mr. George Gormly, and incidentally The New York Planet about as great a service as we could expect to receive from a human being. What you have said throws an entirely new light upon Mr. Gormly's letter. He is in a much more admirable position through you. Why, he appears in this like a hero. Mr. Shaw, will you put this matter in shape to accompany Gormly's letter, while I comment editorially upon it?"

At this moment the cub reporter entered with bottle and glasses.

"It's All Right," He Shouted.

"I'm glad," said Colonel Bill as he poured out a generous portion, "to be of service. After you're all filled up," he continued as at his suggestion the two editors and even the cub reporter accepted a small drink from the large bottle, "we'll drink health and success to my young friend Fordyce, which is now named Gormly, and damnation to the chief of police and his gang!"

And that was the kind of toast in which they could all heartily join.

Whitefield had thought that the incident was completely covered and that nothing more could be added to the amazing story. Before the forms were finally locked, however, and the first edition went to press, the night editor, who still remained at his post, received a communication of such amazing importance that he inserted it after the editorial in large capitals, double leaded, as the completing touch to the most extraordinary announcement that he felt had ever appeared in The Planet.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Something to Live Up To.

Gormly was usually an early riser; but on the morning before election day he slept until an unprecedentedly late hour. He was utterly worn out with the strain of the campaign, anyway, and the occurrences of this last night had almost prostrated him. There was ordinarily nothing much to be done on the next day, the Monday preceding election day. One final meeting was scheduled for Monday night, and that was all.

It was perhaps nine o'clock when he woke up. He was soon bathed and dressed. He had signaled, as was his custom, at the proper time for the serving of his simple breakfast. It was ready for him when he entered the dining room. Somes was there in attendance as usual. A pile of morning papers lay on the buffet. Gormly made a step toward them; but checked himself.

"Why," he thought, "should I spoil my breakfast by reading what the newspapers have to say on the important subject of my confession? The news will keep. Let me at least eat in peace."

"Beg pardon, sir," began Somes deferentially; "but aren't you going to look over the papers, sir, before you eat?"

"No, thank you, Somes. I can guess pretty well what they will say."

But Somes was unusually persistent as well as greatly agitated. He had been up early and had read every scrap in every paper.

"I hope you'll excuse me, Mr. Gormly, sir," he began; "but I really think it'll add to your appetite if you will at least look over The Planet, sir."

Gormly shook his head and frowned a little.

"That will do, Somes!" he said somewhat shortly. "I will see the papers later."

After this somewhat peremptory remark, the man naturally subsided, though his interest and excitement were plainly visible in his nervous movements. He was usually the most delightfully cool and imperturbable of attendants.

"You mustn't take this thing so greatly to heart, Somes," said Gormly at last.

"Indeed, sir," returned the man, "we're all so set on having you elected, and other things, sir, that—"

What he was going to say remained unsaid, for with that delightful opportuneness which can easily be compassed by chroniclers of such veracious tales, I now am pleased to record that the bell of the door of the apartment out across the further revelations of Somes with a loud, clear ring.

"See who it is, Somes," said Gormly indifferently.

"It's been ringing all morning, sir," said the man, turning to leave the room. "There's been the greatest crowd of people here, reporters and newspaper men, and Mr. Watson, and a number of gentlemen who are campaigning for you, and the street's packed with people outside, too."

"Is my friend the chief of police there?"

"No, sir. But there's a squad of officers under a sergeant, and they're making people that haven't any business go on."

"Well, see who it is this time," said Gormly as the bell rang again.

Somes was back in a few minutes.

"It's the janitor, sir. He says the reception room down stairs and the hall's filled with people asking to see you. He says the tenants of the building can't get in or out, and he wants to know what to do."

Gormly glanced at the clock. It was half-past nine.

"Tell them that I will see them all at the store in the auditorium at half-past ten," he replied. "Tell them it's useless to wait here now; that I can't see anybody at present."

Gormly heaved a deep sigh as he finished his breakfast. "Well," he thought, "I have to face them, and perhaps the sooner the better. Now, for the papers."

He looked around for Somes; but that functionary had not yet appeared. He pushed back his chair, rose, walked over to the buffet, and picked up the first one. Somes had been careful to see that the top of the pile and the place of honor was occupied by The New York Planet. From the headlines, Gormly saw, as he supposed he would, that his letter and the accompanying story covered the entire first page. He had scarcely glanced at it when Somes re-entered the room, if possible in greater agitation than ever.

"Beg pardon, sir," he began, his usual method of address.

"Well, what is it?"

"There's two people in the drawing room asking to see you."

"But I thought I gave you orders not to admit anybody, to tell everybody that I would see them at the auditorium in the store at half-past ten?"

"Yes, sir, you did, sir. But I couldn't very well keep these people out."

"Tell them I am busy," said Gormly. "I have no time for anonymous callers."

"Beg pardon, sir," said Somes again; "but really, Mr. Gormly, if you'll excuse me, sir, this presumption, you must see them."

"Are you mad?" asked Gormly.

"Nearly, sir," answered the valet truthfully.

Gormly looked at him curiously. There was so much excitement and nervousness in the man's manner, and yet it seemed to be a rather cheerful excitement, too, that it seemed to presage something of importance. At any rate, after a moment's reflection, the merchant decided from the strangeness of the situation that he would see the people mentioned.

As Gormly entered the sunny, cheerful drawing room, the occupants rose to greet him. One was young Haldane, the other was his sister. Haldane was intensely excited. He rushed at Gormly with the enthusiasm of a boy; grasped his hand, and wrung it frantically.

"It's all right," he shouted. "It's turned out better than anybody could have expected. It's killed the opposition dead. Everybody is for you now."

Gormly heard him as in a dream. He allowed him to shake his hand as he might have shaken a pump handle, could that ancient and useful article have been found in New York. He was looking with all his soul in his glance at Eleanor Haldane, who had not come forward, but stood by the chair in which she had sat, her hands tightly clasping the low back of it. The color that had flooded her face when she first saw him had subsided almost as quickly as it had come. She was very pale and trembling.

Thoughts, strange, bewildering, rushed through Gormly's mind. What could Miss Haldane be doing there? What did she want? Why had she come? She had heard of the incident. He remembered that her brother had taken her one copy of his letter last night. What did her presence mean?

"I just came down here," continued young Haldane, "to tell you these things to relieve your anxiety, and to bring Eleanor. She wanted to see you about—well, you know about what, of course, and—"

Gormly did not know at all; but he nodded vaguely.

"Of course, by this time you've read all about it in The Planet. That old miner came in like a scene in a play. It was perfectly splendid, and I suppose," he looked meaningly at his sister, his glance calling the color once more to her cheek, "that you have read the other communication, which is scarcely less important."

Gormly stared at him in utter amazement.

"I must say," he continued mischievously, "that for a man who is getting everything he wants as you are, you are singularly undemonstrative about it."

"Mr. Gormly," interposed the woman, "I don't believe that you have read the morning papers?"

"Not yet, Miss Haldane."

"Oh!" cried the girl in great dismay.

"By Jove!" exclaimed the young man, "to think of it! I should have had the first copy from the press brought to me if I had been in your place. Well, then, I'll tell you the whole story. Or you've got it in The Planet and you can read it yourself. We'll excuse you while you glance over it; won't we sis?"

"I don't understand," said Gormly, lifting the paper slowly. He had not yet taken his eyes off Miss Haldane.

"On second thoughts," said the young man, "I guess Eleanor had better tell you herself. If you'll excuse me, you two, for a few moments, I'll go into the library."

"Livingstone!" cried the girl imploringly; but her brother only laughed as he left the room, carefully closing the door behind him.

"What is it that I am to be told, Miss Haldane?" asked Gormly, stepping toward her, paper still in hand.

Miss Haldane was in a dilemma. She had been surprised when he had entered the room that Gormly had not greeted her differently. Her position was a tremendously difficult one at best, and his failure to read the paper had rendered it almost insupportable.

"I think," she faltered at last, "that I had better go. You can see me later in the day, and—"

"No," said Gormly resolutely, "you must not go yet. You came down here for some purpose. That fact that I have not read the papers seems to have affected you strangely. If you will give me five minutes, I can look them over and perhaps obtain some clue to your conduct; but I would rather you would tell me what it is, do what you were going to do, say what you were going to say when you came in, than try to find out from the newspapers."

MEAN TRICK PLAYED BY FATE

Chances Are That Statesman Had a Hard Time Explaining Matters to His Wife.

The story is that it happened about like this:

A representative from Indiana came on to Washington when congress started up, and engaged comfortable living quarters before his wife arrived. She reached there some time later on a Saturday night. The next morning she said:

"Now, Ralph, we'll go to church, of course. Which church have you been attending?"

"Wh-er-uh, which one, you say?" repeated the congressman. "Why, there's a mighty nice little church down here just a couple of blocks. It's such an easy walk that I've been going there rather than to some of the more fashionable churches."

"All right, if you feel at home there, that's where we'll go," said the congressman's wife. "We haven't much time, anyhow."

So they put on their things and went to the little church down the street.

When they got inside they made a startling discovery.

They were the only white people in the church.—Philadelphia Ledger.

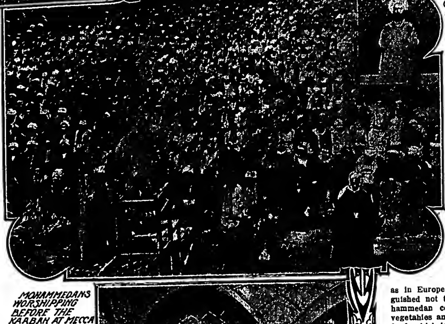
AMAZING SPREAD OF ISLAMISM

WATER-SELLERS AT THE WELL OF ZEM ZEM, MECCA

AT THE HOLY PLACE ALL GOOD MOHAMMEDANS VISIT ONCE IN THEIR LIFETIME



MOHAMMEDANS WORSHIPPING BEFORE THE KAABAH AT MECCA

IN THE MOSQUE AT MECCA AFTER PRAYER

IN this world, according to the latest estimates, there are about 200,000,000 Mohammedans. Of these, no less than 95,000,000 live under British rule—a total of 5,000,000 in excess of the Christian population of King George's dominions.

Most people, in considering these vast hordes of Moslems, never for a moment think of them as militant followers of the Prophet. They look upon the Islam world as quiescent so far as the propagation of its doctrines is concerned—as yielding more and more to the teachings of the armies of Christian missionaries spread out over it.

But, according to a number of these very missionaries, who have gained their knowledge in the battle-line formed by Christianity against Islam and other religions, this is by no means the case. From the front they bring the news that Mohammedanism, far from being quiet, is pulsing with new life; that its missionaries, filled with fanatic zeal, are making hosts of converts to their doctrines, not only among pagans, but among peoples previously converted to Christianity.

Africa is where the pitched battle for converts between Christianity and Islam is being waged most furiously. Those who have been over the ground declare that the religious fate of the Dark Continent hangs in the balance. Mohammedanism has made such progress there of late, they aver, that it is a question whether it will not soon become Africa's dominant faith.

Nor is that portion of the earth the only place where Islam is striding triumphantly forward. Pan-Islamism, sedulously fostered by Abdul Hamid, deposed Sultan of Turkey, has served to stimulate the aggressiveness of the Prophet's followers in India, Malaysia, Central Asia, Siberia, Russia and other lands.

This aggressiveness is noticeable not only among those Mohammedans who seek to reconcile their time-worn religion to modernity, but also among the blind fanatics of orthodoxy, who will not give up one jot or tittle of the doctrines handed down to them by their forefathers straight from the days of Mohammed.

The one great characteristic of the Moslem world today is unrest.

Like the prodigal son in the parable, Islam is coming to itself and is becoming conscious of its need. Three great movements in the Moslem world at the present time are all of them indicative of this unrest—the development of the great dervish orders, the growth of the pan-Islamic spirit and the attempt of the new Islam to rationalize the old orthodoxy—all of them due to the same cause, namely, the readjustment of Islam to the progress of modern thought and western civilization, either by way of protest and defiance, or of accommodation and compromise.

The modernist movement touches every Moslem who receives education on western lines, whether in Java, India, Persia or Egypt, and compels him to adopt a new theology and a new philosophy and new social standards or give up his religion altogether. How far the advocates of the new Islam go in throwing overboard their cargo to save the ship is illustrated in a book, "The Truth About Islam," just published at Cairo by Dr. Muhammad Bodr, a graduate of Edinburgh University. No orthodox Moslem would recognize this presentation of Islam as the same religion which he professes.

The enormous increase and activity of Moslem journalism in all the chief centers of the Moslem world is also an indication of intellectual and social unrest. Some of the leading papers are already the mouthpiece of intolerance and show a sullen attitude toward Christianity.

The religious movements in Islam today are radically progressive or retrogressive. The dervish orders and the Mahdis in Somaliland, Yemen and the Sahara, all believe in a Pan-Islamism utterly opposed to modern civilization, and their cry is "Back to Mohammed."

The advocates of reform in Java and Persia, the preachers of the new Islam in India, and the nationalists in Egypt, on the contrary, are trying to get away from Mohammed and the early standards of Arabian civilization, reject most of the traditions, and make rationalism the basis of their faith.

According to them, Mohammed was neither immaculate nor infallible. Their ideas and their ideals are at the opposite pole of orthodoxy.

However, as has been stated, orthodox Islam and up-to-date Islam seem to be alike in one thing—they are both moving forward.

To turn first to Africa, the great battleground, evidences of this progress appear on every side. In central Africa a dozen sects of dervishes are at work proselytizing—foremost among them the powerful Senusi, who yearly send out large bands of missionaries. In short, as one Christian worker puts it, "Every Mohammedan is a missionary."

One striking thing about this spread of the doctrines of Islam is that European colonial governments tend to help rather than hinder it. The pacification of heathen countries and the suppression of the slave trade, it seems, have been favorable to Mohammedanism.

One missionary explains why Islam is already in possession of great sections of north and east Africa, and is steadily advancing, in this wise:

"It has often been said that the transition from paganism to Christianity is very much more abrupt than that to Islam. But in addition to this, the Mohammedan recognizes in religion as in other matters, a variety of intermediate stages.

"He is satisfied, especially at the beginning, with a very slight degree of adhesion to Islam. It is by no means all converts, but only a few individuals here and there who pay any attention to the deeper religious requirements. No abrupt break in polygamous conditions is demanded, as is the case in Christian missions; while magical practices and other superstitions are tolerated.

"The convert thus loses nothing, but on the contrary gains in social position and consideration, so that his adhesion is almost a matter of course."

In 1871 there were, in Bengal, 17,000,000 Hindoos and 16,500,000 Mohammedans. In 1901 there were 18,000,000 Hindoos and more than nearly 19,500,000 Mohammedans.

Thus, in thirty years, the Mohammedans, who, at the start, numbered half a million less than the Hindoos, had not only made up that deficit, but placed themselves 1,500,000 in the lead.

Basing his statement on these figures, Lieut. Col. Mukerjee, of the Indian Medical Service, in his book entitled "A Dying Race," maintains that in Bengal the future is with the Mohammedans.

In explanation of the success of Moslem methods in India, a Christian missionary who knows that land says:

"The Moslem propagandist is Asiatic; we are not. He can ingratiate himself with the people; he can make himself one of them in every detail of social life; he will give his daughter in marriage to the convert, and while we are learning to speak the language, he grows into their very life.

"The Moslem propagandist is a keen itinerant; why should not our preachers and catechists move about among the people with less show of European tent and boat?

"Martyn Clark says that as ninety-five per cent. of the people live in villages, it were wisdom to learn from the Moslem monarchs, who propagated Islam in the villages; their power perished, but their religion remained."

He sums up admirably the difference between the proselytizing method of Christian and Moslem by saying that the former, in order to succeed, "must be less of a combatant and more of a wooer."

In the great islands of Malaysia Islam is likewise meeting with marked success. A Christian missionary in those remote parts declares that the population of large portions of Java, Celebes, Sumatra, and other less important islands is already quite Islamized.

In Borneo, he adds, Moslem influence is increasing steadily in the same proportion as Paganism is declining. Only at such places where there are Christian missions is this progress checked successfully. But, in the greater part of the island, the Mohammedan propaganda goes on without resistance.

"The Moslems of Malaysia," he says, "who leave their native country in order to establish themselves on the shores of other countries, whether temporarily or permanently, are generally anxious to make proselytes. It is not especially religious conviction that drives them, but rather commercial interest. Those who emigrate are always people who gain their living by trading.

"Now pagan tribes in Malaysia live in communism. The family extends itself to a clan, clans grow to tribes; and family relation is the only tie that holds together these communities. Only among one's family does one feel safe.

"It is a matter of course that the Mohammedan foreigner, as soon as he is established on the shore of the heathen land, tries to enter into family relations with the native tribe in the neighborhood of which he lives and trades. In this he succeeds by marrying a woman belonging to that tribe. He and other fellow Mohammedans create Moslem family circles; for the wives have to adopt the religion of their husbands, be it only superficially. No one will expect the wife to fulfill the duties of her new religion, but her children are sure to become better Mohammedans than their mother.

"In this way a group of Mohammedan families is formed which by and by grows into a Moslem community, and at last becomes a society with its own chief.

"Thus some centuries ago Islam established itself in Sumatra, afterwards in Java and the other islands of Malaysia and in this way we see it at present establishing itself in Central Celebes.

"Sometimes a good number of Mohammedan families settle at the coast, choose a chief, and so from the beginning immediately form a political unity. But whatever its origin may be, a Moslem establishment always exercises influence on the heathen tribes of the interior. Various reasons bring about this supremacy.

"The Mohammedan population does not chiefly live on agriculture. They earn their living by trade and, just as in Europe, it is considered more distinguished not to be an agriculturist. The Mohammedan coast population do grow some vegetables and fruit, but as for the principal food, which is rice, they depend on the people of the interior. On their excursions they have always money with them and they never forget to make a show of it.

"The Mohammedans also dress in a better way than the heathen, and they very cunningly array themselves in clothes which excite the covetousness and desire of their heathen neighbors, who are very fond of buying new articles. They like to perfume themselves and constantly speak with contempt about eating pork and of other customs of the people of the interior. In short, they know how to behave as people of higher rank and quality than the simple pagans.

"Through all these means the Mohammedan traders arouse the people of the interior to imitate their customs, and all these things are profitable to a propagation of Islam."

From Asiatic Russia come similar surprising tidings of Moslem encroachments in the field of pagan conversion. A Christian worker in that territory tells how, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the "Apostle of the Altai," reverend Father Macary, crossed the plains south of Tobolsk in Siberia to reach the Altai, and perceived the state of the millions of heathen Kirghis living there. He asked the Russian government to allow him to begin missionary work among the Kirghis, but he was told that these people were too savage as yet to become converts to Christianity.

Not long after that Mohammedan missionaries entered the field, worked with great zeal and perseverance, and won over all the Kirghis tribes to the faith of Islam.

As a result of this setback, the writer states, "the Christian missionary has now to fight, not the weak and beggarly elements of an animistic religion, but the seemingly inaccessible granite fortress of Islam."

Regarding the general situation in Siberia the same missionary says:

"Moslem propaganda is gaining in strength and Mohammedan influence is growing, while Christian influence, as represented by the Russian church, is weaker. The unlucky war with Japan and the proclamation of liberty of conscience have done their work. Forty thousand baptized Christians, formerly Mohammedans and heathens, have returned to paganism and Islam. Islam especially comes out of this crisis strengthened and more aggressive than ever before."

In China there are millions of Mohammedans, but, according to Christian testimony, they are not markedly aggressive in propagating the doctrines of the prophet. The same seems true of Turkey and Persia.

In conclusion, attention should be called to a phase of the Mohammedan situation, which is especially startling from the fact that it is near to home, viz.: the activity of Moslem proselytizers in this western hemisphere.

In several of the West Indian islands and the Guiana territory of South America there are thousands of East Indian Mohammedans. In British Guiana there are 22,000; in Dutch Guiana, 5,800; in Central America and the West Indies, 20,000.

"Such a small fraction of the population might well be omitted in our survey," state the editors of "Islam and Missions," "were it not that undoubted testimony comes in regard to the activity of Islam, especialy in British Guiana and the West Indies.

"If the results of a century's missionary effort in British Guiana are to be preserved the Christian church must make a more determined effort to combat the influence of the East Indian. The struggle of the future in British Guiana will be between Christ and Mohammed."

KING PLAIN CITIZEN

Spanish Monarch Acts Like Ordinary Man Occasionally.

When on Vacation at His Summer Residence Alfonso Talks, Walks, Rides and Mingles Generally With the People.

San Sebastian, Spain.—At this beautiful northern coast resort of Spain King Alfonso XIII. enjoys life in his boyish, free fashion. Imagine a great round bay so locked in that its waters are a pond. High around its edges circle the villas of the rich, while along the sandy shore the Royal Yacht club and bath houses adjoin private beaches next to the great hotels and the public promenade.

Along the sands the public bath houses and gay tents flash all colors, fairly soaked in sunlight, even in late autumn. The stone promenade, bordered by shade trees and forged iron balustrades, continues round the bay, through gorgeous parks and gardens to the public gambling halls, with the marble terraces and flowers, restaurants and cafes of one of the most luxurious casinos of Europe. Back of all this is the modern built town of wide, shady streets, parks and monuments in bronze and marble, rich shops, cafe terraces and flaunting awnings, street sprinklers, gurgling fountains and that mixed perfume of orange peel, violets and tuberoses that marks the south of Europe.

Chief of the villas perched high around the bay is the king's Miramar palace, half hidden among its forests. At night any traveler can lose himself in its winding alleys, lighted by 900 electric lamps. Anyone who has been there must have thought how easy it would be for armed conspirators to enter the park and take the palace by surprise. The guard at the gate is composed of three men of the Minarets corps. At the wide door of the palace the only sentry is an old veteran, wearing many decorations, but unarmed. The idea generally held that the king of Spain lives surrounded by an army to protect his life is absurd. The "Alabarderos"—mounted escort—and the large military staff is regularly invisible in its barracks behind the palace and exists merely to satisfy court protocol. When the royal family enjoys its home life in the evenings after audience hours are over, it is no more protected than any other well-to-do family of San Sebastian.

King Alfonso.

Every day while in residence at San Sebastian, the king, unaccompanied by soldiers, on foot, on horseback, or in auto or carriage, can be seen going about. We met him once in a lone spot of the Corniche, writes a traveler, attempting to clean three plugs that had got choked by soot. My French friends stopped and asked the customary, "Anything we can do?"

"These plugs are choked with soot," replied Alfonso. His chauffeur was respectfully offering new ones, when our French friend—a pure automobile crank like the king—explained that he could clean those plugs by backing rapidly up the slope.

"That is what I said," cried Alfonso; 'Oust! tumble in!" and, with a very tricky swing, he got his weight on the crank and started the heavy motor before his chauffeur knew what he was up to, jumped in beside his only companion, a silent military man, and began backing up the slope at second speed.

"Now that is just the type of automobile crank who will not let his chauffeur do a thing,' expained the Frenchman. From this time Alfonso nodded to us with a smile, content that here were three men and a lady who had seen him, Alfonso, acting as a man.

Pool Ball in His Mouth.

Philadelphia. — Robert Wilson, a youth living at 1330 North Eighth street, made a bet with several companions that he had the largest mouth in the crowd, and to prove his assertion thrust a pool ball between his jaws.

He won the wager, but lost several teeth, for the ivory ball fitted his mouth so well that it took two hours' work on the part of physicians at the Children's Homeopathic hospital to remove the ball, and that was accomplished only after the forceps had been used.

Wilson walked to the hospital with his friends. The physicians first told him to force the ball out with his tongue. His efforts were unavailing and the pain from his distended jaws so great that it was determined to sacrifice five front teeth.

THE SUNBEAM.

Practical School for the Housewife

MOTHER COULDN'T GET UP A MEAL LIKE THIS IN A THOUSAND YEARS — NOSIREE

PITTSBURG.—While the theme of teaching love in the public schools has been bruited by theorists, materialists of the Margaret Morrison Carnegie School for Woman have been arranging a practical course for brides, and have announced that it would be added to the curriculum this month.

It is explained in emphatic terms that the new classes are in no way devised to encourage elopements, and that only young women twenty-one years or older will be admitted.

In considering the question of instructing young wives in the serious side of matrimony, the faculty has selected subjects calculated in the members' minds to add to post-nuptial happiness, bring contentment to husbands, lessen milliners' and dressmakers' bills, and preclude, as far as possible, the presence of indigestion.

Miss Dorothy B. Scott, assistant registrar of the school, explains that newlyweds will be taught all the dietary and culinary frills calculated to make young men forget the cooking of their mothers.

She also says the hours of instruction will be so arranged that they will not interfere with the home life or encroach upon the evening hours when husband and wife want, or should want, to be together, but probably will take place in the afternoon, after the morning housework is completed and when many young wives attend the matinees.

Cooking, from the boiling of eggs to making of pastry, may be learned in ten lessons at $18; theory of dressmaking and shirtwaist making, each $10 for ten lessons; millinery, 15 lessons for $10, and garmant design, 20 lessons for $15. Thus the entire course may be taken for $63, but any one or more courses may be selected and the time lessened. They are also to be taught how to launder clothes.

Had Marriage License But No Bride

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.—An elderly negro walked into the forum presided over by Judge H. B. Abernethy the other day and after looking around in a stealthy manner, waddled up to the judge's desk and said: "'Cuse me, sah, is yo' de jedge of dis yere cote?"

"I reckon so, uncle. What can I do for you?" replied Judge Ab.

"Does yo' marry folkes?"

"Sure; do you desire to enter the state of connubial bliss and felicity?"

"Jedge, what yo' says is so, but ah 'clar I ain't done hit. What ah wants is ter get married."

"Have you secured the license?"

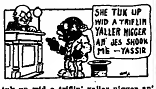
"Yessah, jedge, yere hit are," said the old man.

"This seems all right. Where's the feminine part of this contract?"

"Sey which, jedge?"

"Where is the woman you are to marry?"

"Dat's what Ah wants yo' ter do, git de ooman. Yo' see, jedge, dat Milindy pusson what has her name writ on dat yere license promises ter marry me, an' Ah goes ter git de paper. While Ah was gone she done



SHE TUK UP WID A TRIFLIN YALLER NIGGER AN' JES SHOOK ME —YASSIR

tuk up wid a triflin' yaller nigger an' gin ma de go by. She did jedge."

"I can't force the woman to marry you, but you can sue her for breach of promise."

"Breeches o' de promise, jedge! I don't reckon she wear 'em. Ain't dis yere paper what I paid six bits fer no 'count?"

"Well, you might sue the woman for the $1.75."

"Dat's hit, jedge, dat's hit. What Ah wants is ma money back."

Finally Judge Ab told the old darkey to wait a few days to see if Milindy would not change her mind.

The old man looked a little crestfallen at not getting either the woman or the money, and left the court evidently disappointed at the refusal of the court to compel the marriage.

The "Turkey Trot" Barred by Society

STOP IT —THAT 'TURKEY TROT' IS TOO FIERCE FOR US

NEW YORK.—The "Turkey Trot," "Grizzly Bear," and even the "Chicken Reel," the last word in the dance too, may be all right in Newport, but they don't go among real society folk in New York.

That much has been learned in interviews with several dancing masters who number fashionable folk among their pupils.

These teachers instruct in the various dances, but they won't allow them in public receptions or parties. Discussion of these dances came through the announcement by the committee on amusements and vacation resources of working girls that the "turkey trot" and "grizzly bear" must go. The dances are supposed to have been originated by negroes of the underworld. The stage got them next, then society folk and then the tough dance halls. Then the cry to halt.

It didn't come soon enough, however, to stop the "chicken reel," which W. S. Reeves, head of a dancing school, at 2630 Broadway, originated.

"I originated the "chicken reel," said Mr. Reeves, "but I deny that it is improper. It is the latest development and has none of the features of the 'turkey trot' and the 'grizzly bear.'

In the "chicken reel" the partners hold hands and take four steps forward, flapping the outer arms like the wings of a chicken and rising on the toes at the same time.

Then both stop and scratch like a chicken four times with the right foot facing each other.

"Joy Kiss" Causes Strike in School

FREEHOLD, N. Y.—As a sequel to that historic "emotional kiss," the boy and the girl students of the high school side by side marched out on strike from the classrooms the other day and paraded the streets, announcing that they were out to stay until Principal Roy Leon Smith was reinstated.

Only those students who feared the parental slipper remained and it is expected they will also go out later. There were eighty odd in the demonstrating procession, and they made more noise than five times that number of men would have done.

While they were marching along they came upon Samuel P. Smith, president of the board of education and shouted to him that they wanted Principal Smith back. President Smith says some boys not only shook their fists at him but insulted him in other ways. The girls chorused. "Smith, Smith; we want our principal back!"

WE WANT PRINCIPAL SMITH BACK !-?!
SMITH

In the primary schools all is unrest. The younger children have caught the strike fever. They are in general charge of Miss Carrie Atkinson, whom the board of education named as temporary superintendent when Mr. Smith Friday refused to take the position pending the settlement of trouble following the removal of Village Superintendent Barnes on charges that he was seen with a teacher on his lap kissing him.

Barnes alleged the kiss was due to hysterical gratitude because he had assisted the teacher in passing an examination. Various petitions are in circulation asking the board to reconsider his dismissal.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

IMPORTANT PRE-INCA FINDS

Dr. Hiram Bingham, assistant professor of Latin-American history in Yale university, who set out in June to find lost cities of the pre-Inca period in Peru, has returned quite satisfied with the results of his expedition. With him were Prof. Isaiah Bowman, geologist; Kai Handricksen, topographer, and H. L. Tucker, archaeologist-engineer.

The expedition found one of the lost cities covered with a cornfield on a plateau about 2,000 feet above the valley of the River Urumbamba. The explorers were attracted to the plateau by Indians who told them of marble relics there. A goat path led from the valley to the plateau, which was almost surrounded by precipitous rocks. Professor Bingham says:

"We found ruins of buildings almost palatial constructed of white granite, or, as the Spanish despoilers called it, marble, some still more than ten feet above ground. We were the first white men, I fancy, that had ever seen this city since the time of Pizarro, 400 years ago. The stones of the houses were beautifully joined and the cutting was perfect. The buildings were made without mortar. The foundation stones were very large, some being eight feet wide, six feet deep and twelve feet long.

KAISER A BUSINESS MAN

If all the rulers of Europe should make a bid for the title of "business" monarch, it would undoubtedly go to the emperor of Germany. He is an untiring worker, and loves work better than all else except his army. Nobody can be in Wilhelm's employ, whether he occupies an important position in the army or is servant in the royal household, and be an idler.

His rational mode of living is one of the main reasons for his ability to do so much work. Though he has a beautiful palace in Berlin the royal family live most of the time at Potsdam, a suburb, so that the emperor can work quietly. He goes into the city every day by means of a fast-flying auto car.

He meets the empress at eight o'clock and they breakfast together. The meal usually consists of coffee, rolls, butter and cold meat.

By 8:30 he is seated at his desk in his study, which belongs to his royal suite, where he has absolute quiet. Here he is awaited by his adjutants. A glance at the room shows that this is a "business office," not a lounging room for a king. On the wall are hung a few interesting but simple pictures. The polished floors are covered with a few handsome rugs, and there are several tables used for documents and typewriters.

TO BRAVE BRIGANDS AGAIN

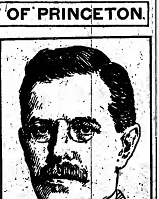
Miss Ellen M. Stone who, ten years ago, while a missionary in Bulgaria, was for six months a prisoner in the hands of brigands, who held her and her companion, Mrs. Katerina Stephanova Tsilka, for ransom, is arranging to return to Turkey in the capacity of a missionary. Miss Stone is completely recuperated in mind and body from her terrible experience of a decade ago.

Miss Stone says she is interested in some pending legislation in congress and that as soon as this is settled she will go abroad. She is very hopeful for the future of Christian missions in Turkey.

Miss Stone is not afraid to return to Turkey. "I want to see young Turkey," she says. "I am interested in the attempt of the party to rise out of the ruck and embrace modern civilization. I want to help Christianize the Turks."

In September, 1901, Miss Stone was one of a party of sixteen persons traveling from Samakof to Salonica. Near Temoko they were held up by brigands. Fourteen of the party were released, but Miss Stone and Madame Tsilka were held captive and carried off to a mountain lair. The brigands demanded $110,000 for their release at the time.

NEW PRESIDENT OF PRINCETON.



Princeton, N. J.—John Grier Hibben, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of logic and philosophy at Princeton university, has been elected the fourteenth president of the institution by the unanimous vote of the board of trustees.

He succeeds Woodrow Wilson, who resigned October 20, 1910, to accept the Democratic nomination for governor. Dr. Hibben is fifty-one years old.

Many names had been considered by the board at various times, including that of Dr. Hibben.

Dr. Hibben said that he accepted the presidency of Princeton with a feeling of gratitude as well as one of deep responsibility. He said he wanted it understood that all factional feeling and strife had been eliminated at Princeton, and he felt he could enter his new office with no fear of hindrance because of any controversies among members of the faculty and the board of trustees.

Immediately after his election Dr. Hibben was summoned before the trustees in the Chancellor Green library, where he took the oath of office.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Paul Jones Not Permitted to Rest

WASHINGTON.—Poor Paul Jones. It begins to look as though our first admiral of the navy, who was a giddy sort of old-time pirate, is never to be permitted to rest either in body or in memory. Gen. Horace Porter, formerly American minister to France, discovered the burial spot of John Paul Jones in the heart of Paris under a pile of masonry, which had been erected into homes since the American admiral had been buried there. At his own expense he had the building razed, secured the body of Paul Jones and brought it to this country. The identification of the body by General Porter was made upon comparative measurements of the body which General Porter had discovered in Paris. When the leaden casket was opened it was found that the body was in fine state of preservation, and the measurements agreed exactly with those which General Porter had discovered. The features were plainly the same as those of the Houdon bust of Paul Jones. The body had been found by General Porter in what was the only Protestant cemetery in the city of Paris at the time of the admiral's death, and was secured only after two months tunneling under buildings yet left standing. Congress declined to make an appropriation, but the president did send a warship, and the body was brought back to the United States in state and carried to Annapolis. There were great doings there at the time of the arrival of the body, and it was then put in a great leaden casket, and is now packed away under the stairs in a dark corner of one of the buildings. A great crypt is being prepared for the body, and it is expected that there will be ceremonies of magnificent character when the body is laid in this crypt. Meanwhile American critics are attacking the authenticity of the John Paul Jones find. Charles Henry Hart of Philadelphia, who is said to be an authority, declares that the body is not the body of America's first naval hero. General Porter says that Hart's attack on the authenticity of the body is too silly for serious consideration.

Scandalized at Rank of "Furriners"

MARTHA HEARD has been on a visit to the White House. In a new homespun dress, with a new red bandana handkerchief wound tightly around her head and another crossed fichu fashion over her ample bosom, Martha has been showing Mrs. Taft and Helen Taft how a good old southern mammy can give a French maid cards and spades and then beat her at her own game.

Martha went to the White House as the maid of a young southern woman who visited Miss Helen Taft.

When preparations for a great dinner began at the White House Martha was in her element. Herself one of those famous cooks whose art has made the hospitality of the south traditional, Martha asked to be allowed to have a hand in the preparation of the menu selected by Mrs. Taft. That gracious lady readily gave her consent, and for the first time since the days of Andrew Jackson the savory odors of old-fashioned southern cooking rose from the White House kitchen stove.

One feature of Washington life at which Martha feels scandalized is the high social rank of the diplomatic corps.

"Dar in Washington city," she declares, with a note of scorn in her voice, "de white folks mixes in wid all sorts o' furriners—Chinamens, Japanese, Turks, an', wusser'n dat—yas, Lawd, wusser'n dat—dey actually goes wid a cullah'd couple." (She refers to the Haytien minister and his wife.)

LAN' SAKES OB ALL DE FURRINERS I EVER SEED

"When I knowed 'bout dat culleh'd couple comin' ter a state reception et de White House, hit look ink I couldn't hol' in no longer. So I sez to Miss Taft: 'Lawd Omighty, Miss Taft, whut you reckin dis country gwin' ter come ter, wid a nigger couple up here mixin' roun' wid de white quality?'

"Well, sah, hit look ink Miss Taft an' Miss Helen laf fit ter kill deyselves 'bout dis, but I had done got de burden off'n my mind.

"And Miss Taft she ask ev'ry day: 'Well, well, Marthy, how do hit all strike you? You never did think you'd be a guest at the White House, did you?"

Indian Population Rapidly Increasing

EXCLUSIVE of Alaska, the Indian population of the United States in 1910 was, in round figures, 305,000, as compared with 243,000 in 1890, and 270,000 in 1900. Contrary to the popular notion, the Indian is increasing. His gain in numbers, moreover, is far less surprising than is his growth in industry and intelligence. The 5,470 Indians residing in New York, chiefly remnants of the old Iroquois, follow the same pursuits as their white neighbors, dress the same, and, save in complexion, differ from the whites in no essential particular. Much more than a third of all the Indians in the United States, or 117,000, reside in Oklahoma.

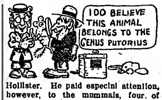
Most of these are members of the old Five Civilized Tribes (Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws and Seminoles), each of which, in the old Indian territory, which was part of the present state of Oklahoma, had a civil government of its own for two-thirds of a century, with schools, churches, mines, factories, mercantile houses, banks and other accessories of the highest civilization.

New Animals Discovered by Curator

N. Hollister, assistant curator of the division of mammals, United States National museum, announces the discovery of four new animals from the Canadian Rockies, in a paper just published by the Smithsonian institution.

During last summer a small party of naturalists from the Smithsonian institution accompanied the expedition of the Alpine club of Canada to the Mt. Robson region, where they made the first natural history collection ever taken in that vicinity. The paper mentioned above is the first publication issued by the institution on this expedition, although J. H. Riley, a member of the party, has written a description of two new species of birds discovered on the trip, which has recently been published in the proceedings of the Biological Society of Washington; both of the birds are of the sparrow family, one a song sparrow, and the other a species known as fox sparrow.

The natural history work of the expedition was under the charge of Mr.



I DO BELIEVE THIS ANIMAL BELONGS TO THE GENUS PUTORIUS

Hollister. He paid especial attention, however, to the mammals, four of which he describes—a chipmunk, a manteled ground squirrel and two bats.

The chipmunk is a new species, and all the specimens of it come from the region along the boundary line between British Columbia and Alberta, from Yellowhead Pass northward. The ground squirrel is a beautifully marked and highly colored form of the genus, and was found living in the alpine meadows and rocks of the snow-covered region above timber line. The head and shoulders are a rich and glossy Mars brown, and the sides are marked by conspicuous lateral stripes.

PASSING OF THE PIGTAIL.

Although the queue, less reverently known as pigtail, is most commonly associated in the public mind of today with the people of China, and although that fashion of wearing the hair has probably been attributed by the thoughtless in many instances to what most of us were taught by our school geographies to regard as the half-civilized condition of the Chinese, it is a fact well worth noting that the Chinese are by no means the only nation on earth to have shown respect and partiality to the queue. The recent edict sanctioning the abolition of the pigtail in China reminds the London Chronicle that it is not so very long ago since the pigtail disappeared not merely from the British army and navy, but even from everyday civilian life in England. Waist-long pigtails were the fashionable wear in England about 1740, and before that the bag wig had been adorned with a pigtail looped up in a black silk flag. As late as 1858 an old gentleman was seen in Cheapside with his gray hair tied behind in a short queue, and it appears that even today may be found in England a relic of the pigtail; for, according to the Chronicle, three pieces of black velvet on the dress tunics of officers in the Royal Welsh Fusiliers are the remains of the ribbon with which the queue was tied.

Another young Englishman has dashed into New York to spend 24 hours there "seeing America." What an interesting report he will have to make of the great Missouri and Missippi valleys! What accurate descriptions he can give of the Southland with its wonderful work of unfolding resources going on! What graphic accounts of the prodigious west, this vast theater of imperial progress, he will make! If he could run into some well-informed Yankee on Broadway he might get a second-hand statement of what America is, but he can never find out simply by standing and viewing what he finds in New York, says the Omaha Bee. He cannot even see all of that city, and very little of the elements and resources that make it. Americans are proud of their metropolis, second city in the world in size and first in many other respects, but they would never go there to get the broadest view of continental America. They might go there for their ideas of American provincialism. Our young guest from abroad stands only before a great window that looks out upon America, not before the mirror that adequately reflects it. Of course, it could not be otherwise.

In the Chicago public library during the year 3,340,000 books have been called for, more than two-thirds of them for home use. Before deciding just how literary Chicago is, however, it will be necessary to know how many of the 3,340,000 books were histories and biographies and other serious works and how many of them were ephemeral "best sellers."

The board of education in Los Angeles has barred boxing for the high school girls for fear their beauty and their prospects may both be marred. It is very likely that the reason given for the prohibition will cause its unquestioning acceptance by the fair subjects of the ukase.

A New York jury awarded a lawyer six cents damages and Justice Goff set the verdict aside with the observation that a lawyer's reputation must be worth more than that. Nevertheless the justice must admit that it depends on the lawyer, just as in any other case it must depend on the man. Membership in any profession or employment in any occupation does not constitute a certificate of character.

The coloring of meerschaum pipes can now be done by a machine that never burns the pipe, but in spite of this great modern improvement there will undoubtedly be men who will go right on trying to color their meerschaum pipes themselves, and not infrequently spoiling them in the process, in the same old-fashioned way.

The Western Union's new office building in New York is to be only 26 stories high, and the New York papers are asking. "Why this moderation?"

An eastern couple kept the fact of their marriage a secret for fifty years. They had no fancy, evidently, for tin, glass or silver.

In asking that tips be abolished the waiters want it understood that they want something equally good as a substitute.

A St. Louis wife, twelve years of age, has asked for her first divorce. Evidently she is out for a record.

ANXIOUS MOMENTS

PEKING IN PERIL

AMERICANS ARE TOLD TO SEEK SAFETY BY U. S. MINISTER CALHOUN.

FIGHTING MAY COME SOON

Manchu and Chinese Troops Near Conflict—Premier to Go to Tien Tsin at First Opportunity—Republic Demands $7,000,000.

Peking.—All Americans residing in the outlying districts of this city have been called in by United States Ambassador Calhoun.

The friction between the Manchu troops of the imperial army and Yuan Shi Kai's force of Chinese troops is constantly increasing, and a serious conflict may be precipitated at any moment.

The warning is given to missionaries at several important stations in Chi Li province and to Americans doing business in the capital outside the foreign concessions. There is a guard of marines at the legation, and those who seek refuge there will be safe from violence, it is thought. In an emergency the military forces of all the powers will act together for the protection of foreigners.

There are now about 1,500 American marines and soldiers in China, including the regiment of infantry which came last week from the Philippines and other men brought in quietly from time to time in the last few weeks from war vessels in coast waters. These forces are guarding a section of the railroad from the capital to the seashore, but would be within easy call in case they were needed in this city.

Shanghai.—Huang Sing, the republican minister of war, made a demand on the China Merchants' Steam Navigation company for about $7,000,000. In the event of failure by the company to produce the sum the company's vessels will be commandeered by the republican government and sold. The directors of the company asked the war minister for time to consult their stockholders.

WEBSTER GETS LIFE TERM

Chicago Physician Who Confessed He Murdered His Wife Sentenced to Joliet Prison.

Oregon, Ill.—Dr. Harry Elgin Webster of Chicago was sentenced to life imprisonment at hard labor in the Joliet penitentiary for the murder of his wife, Bessie Kent Webster.

Judge Richard S. Farrand, before imposing the sentence, read a long statement excoriating the physician. In concluding he said:

"It is the sentence of this court that you be imprisoned in the penitentiary at Joliet for and during your natural life, the first day of that imprisonment to be in solitary confinement, the balance of your time at hard labor, and that you pay the costs of prosecution.'

BILL URGES HITCHCOCK PLAN

Representative Cary of Wisconsin Offers Measure to Provide Government Owned Telegraph Lines.

Washington.—Representative Carey of Wisconsin, a Republican, has introduced a bill providing for government ownership of telegraph lines, a project recently urged by Postmaster General Hitchcock. It was referred to the postoffice committee.

At Sea Without Compass.

Charleston, S. C.—Having lost charts and instruments during a storm at sea the first week in January, the British steamship George Pyman, from Nordenhem, Germany, arrived here battered and bruised. After their marine instruments had been lost they steered by the sun.

Baby Swallows Tack; Dies.

Terre Haute, Ind.—The two-year-old son of Joseph Davies died here as the result of swallowing a tack which penetrated its windpipe.

GOMPERS IS BITTER

CHALLENGES HEYBURN TO PRODUCE ANYTHING AGAINST HIM.

Defies Senator to Furnish Proof That He Was Connected With Dynamiting.

Washington.—Defying Senator Heyburn to prove in a court of law that he was connected even in the smallest way with the McNamara dynamite outrages, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, made bitter answer in the American Federationist to charges declaimed by Heyburn on the floor of the senate.

In his statement Mr. Gompers says:

"And now a word with you, Senator Heyburn. I ask you to read the editorial in this issue of the American Federationist under the caption 'The Man Higher Up.' You will observe there not only my denial of any knowledge of, or connection with, any dynamiting or other unlawful conduct, but you will also observe that I therein challenge Burns to prove any charge which either or all of them may bring against me.

"I now challenge you to produce in a court of law any such evidence.

BLACKMAIL BY BIG PARTIES

Senator Culberson Charges Corporations Were Intimidated for Campaign Contributions in 1904.

Washington.—"We know corporations engaged in interstate commerce were intimidated and blackmailed for campaign contributions," said Senator Culberson in reviewing the alleged activity of national campaign committees in 1904. He was urging action on his resolution providing for an investigation.

"The year 1904 surpassed all others in the audacity and indecency with which campaign funds were demanded," he said.

DECREE VOID, TWO HUSBANDS

Illinois Woman in Predicament Through Violating Law by Remarrying Within a Week.

Mount Vernon, Ill.—Because Ida Dodson married another man in St. Louis a week after she was divorced from James Dodson, Judge Green vacated the decree and she now has two husbands. The reason for vacating the decree was that the contracting parties knew the Illinois law and left the state for the purpose of violating it. She was married to James Carroll of Bluford, Ill.

STANDARD OIL FINED $55,000

New York Corporation Mulcted for 143 Violations of the Interstate Commerce Law.

Buffalo, N. Y.—The Standard Oil company of New York was fined $55,000 by Judge Hazel in the United States district court in this city for 143 violations of the interstate commerce law in accepting rate concessions in 1904 and 1905 from the Pennsylvania and New York Central railroads on shipments of oil from Olean, N. Y., to Burlington, Vt.

Explosion in Asia Kills Many.

Juldja, Chinese Turkestan.—A large number of people were killed here and several hundred houses destroyed by a terrific explosion at the powder magazine in the old city of Suidun, which lies to the north of New Kuldja.

Admiral Hellner Dead.

New York.—Rear Admiral Lewis C. Hellner, U. S. N., retired, died at the naval hospital here. He was sixty-odd years old and was graduated from the naval academy in 1870.

TAFT GREETS DUKE

CONNAUGHT MAKES BRIEF VISIT TO WHITE HOUSE, PRESIDENT RETURNS CALL.

GIVEN A CAVALRY ESCORT

Troopers Conduct Royal Guest, Who Later Dines at British Embassy and Visits Newspapermen in Eight-Hour Visit to Capital.

Washington.—The duke of Connaught, the first royal visitor to Washington in many years, was received by President Taft at the executive mansion and his call was returned by the president at the British embassy.

Escorted to the White House by cavalry, received with all the honors that flashing sabers, martial music and ten aids could accord his royal station, presented by the British ambassador to the president of the United States, the duke was then in turn introduced by the president to Mrs. Taft. All the women of the cabinet circle, including Miss Taft, were presented to the duke, but in the case of the president's wife, the usual form of royal presentation was reversed.

As the president and the duke stood chatting in the blue room it would have been difficult for a stranger to determine which was of royal blood and which an American citizen.

The eight hours the duke spent in Washington were marked by his exchange of calls with the president, a dinner and reception at the British embassy and a brief appearance at the National Press club. The latter occasion, at which he saw the Washington correspondents of the newspapers of the country, was the only affair except of a personal or purely official character he has attended since coming to the United States.

TELLS HOW FUND WAS SPENT

Secretary Knox Appears Before House Committee With Champlain Fete Vouchers.

Washington.—One gorgeous dinner at ten dollars per cover for the elite; a 50-cent luncheon for ordinary members of the legislatures; cocktails, wines, traveling expenses and a bouquet of Lilies of the Valley for the wife of the postmaster general of Canada, accounted for every penny of the mysterious $20,000 fund appropriated in 1909 for government participation in the now famous celebration at Lake Champlain.

Secretary Knox, under subpoena, appeared before the house committee for expenditures for the state department and laid bare vouchers covering the entire expenditure.

"Loose practices have existed in conducting the secret or emergency fund," admitted Secretary Knox. "Your investigation directed my attention to the abuse. I think a few expenditures should not be made public. Some, of course, must not be."

Secretary Knox read a letter written by himself to the president recommending that the vouchers be made public. The president directed the production of the vouchers.

CHURCHES SHOW POOR GAIN

Fail to Keep Abreast With Increased Population of Country, According to Census Report.

New York.—Churches in the United States are not keeping abreast of the increase of population, according to the compilation of Dr. H. K. Carroll, former director of the religious census, just issued.

The churches of the United States, according to Dr. Carroll, added only 594,366 to their membership in 1911. Of this 230,665 is credited to the Catholics and 204,289 to the Methodists. There was also an increase of 1,990 ministers and 2,832 churches in the same period.

"The increase in 1911 was less than 1.7 per cent," says Doctor Carroll, "which cannot be considered at all satisfactory."

YUKON OUTDONE IN MANITOBA

Hundreds of Men, Women and Children Flock to Newly Discovered Gold Fields.

Winnipeg, Man.—Men, women and even children are flocking to Minitonas, a little town on the Canadian Northern railway 268 miles west of here.

Gold has been discovered there, and if even only a small percentage of the fabulous stories being told are true it is the richest find in the history of western Canada and rivals the Yukon fields.

Gold in paying quantities have been struck in seams only two feet below the surface and rich finds have been made in all directions from Minitonas.

Senator Grady Critically Ill.

New York.—State Senator Thomas F. Grady, Democratic leader in the upper chamber of the state legislature, is in a private sanitarium here, suffering from diabetes. His condition is said to be critical.

"Silly" Delaney Is Dead.

Oakland, Cal.—William A. ("Billy") Delaney, famous trainer of champion pugilists, died here at his home in this city. He had been ill for several months and his death was not unexpected.

TURKS ARE RELEASED

ITALY FREES PHYSICIANS AND NURSES SEIZED ON SHIP.

Insurance Rates Are Increased on Vessels Because of the Anxiety.

Rome.—The Italian government has ordered that the 29 Turks arrested aboard the French mail steamer Manouba shall be immediately released. The Turks are now at Cagliari, in Sardinia.

An examination showed that four of them are physicians and the remainder hospital attendants belonging to the Red Crescent society.

This government order was issued following a conference on the subject between the Marquis di San Giuliano, the Italian foreign minister, and Camille Barre, the French embassador to Italy. Both expressed deep regret that the incident should have occurred.

London.—The policy of Italy in indiscriminately stopping trading steamers and searching them for Turkish officers and contraband has had a disturbing effect here. Shipping circles are indignant and some uneasiness has been felt in financial circles.

Lloyds have done a large volume of business at five per cent. on the prospect of a war between France and Italy within the next four months, and several risks have been accepted at six per cent. on an outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and France and Germany within the next six months.

The British government has made no announcement in respect to what action it will take on the seizure by the Italians of a number of Turkish officers from the British steamer Africa, but it is expected that a definite move will be made within the next few days.

WOULD BREAK PHONE TRUST

Petition for Dissolution of American Telephone and Telegraph Co. Filed With Wickersham.

New York.—A petition to dissolve the American Telephone and Telegraph company on the ground that it is a monopoly in violation of the provisions of the Sherman law was made public here a few hours in advance of its presentation to United States Attorney General Wickersham in Washington. The petition is signed by George Lambert, a justice of the peace in Pelham, N. Y.

It is charged that the operations of the American Telephone and Telegraph company, in the acquirement of control of these subsidiary companies, were practically identical with the operations of the Standard Oil and tobacco trusts, which were declared illegal by the United States Supreme court.

May's Landing, N. J. — Louis Kuehnle, Republican leader of Atlantic City, who was recently convicted of unlawfully participating in the awarding of a contract to a company in which he was interested while he was a member of the Atlantic City water commission, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment at hard labor and to pay a fine of $1,000.

Kuehnle was released on bail pending an appeal for a new trial. The sentence was pronounced by Supreme Court Justice Kalisch.

COULON WINS IN KNOCKOUT

Bantam Champion Whips Harry Forbes, Former Holder of Title, in Third Round at Kenosha.

Kenosha, Wis.—Johnny Coulon, the world's bantam champion, won a technical knockout decision over Harry Forbes, the champion of 1903, after the third round was two minutes old in their battle here. Coulon won without a struggle because Forbes sapped all his strength in making the weight. Forbes was down four times before Kid Howard, his manager, mercifully tossed in a towel from the old champ's corner.

M'FARLAND TOYS WITH WARD

American Lightweight Easily Defeats English Opponent in Six-Round Bout at Philadelphia.

Philadelphia.—"Packey" McFarland, the Chicago boy who aspires to the lightweight championship, beat "Jack" Ward of England by a big margin in a special six-round bout at the National Athletic club. From the start McFarland's mastery was evident, although in the early rounds he never cared to press his advantage. Ward fought almost entirely on the defensive and "Packey" kept him on the hop nearly all the time.

BURN BUILDING TO KILL GERM

Only Way to Get Rid of Them, and Occasion Was Made a Good Object Lesson.

A ramshackle building in Winston-Salem was recently burned at the request of the local Anti-Tuberculosis league, because it was said to be alive with tuberculosis germs and could not be properly fumigated.

For days before the building was burned huge placards announcing the hour of destruction and giving reasons for the burning were hung about in prominent places. Among other things the placards said: "Within the past 15 months two men who sold fruit, etc., here have died of tuberculosis but unconsciously left millions of tuberculosis germs by careless spitting. The building is so open that it cannot be effectively fumigated. The only practical means of disinfecting is by fire."

At the appointed hour, while millions of tuberculosis germs were being burned, 5,000 pamphlets telling how to prevent consumption, were distributed to the crowd looking on.

Father Bernard Vaughn was condemning a somewhat acrimonious religious argument.

GRAND TO LIVE

And the Last Laugh is Always the Best

"Six months ago I would have laughed at the idea that there could be anything better for a table beverage than coffee," writes an Ohio woman, "now I laugh to know there is.

"Since childhood I drank coffee freely as did the other members of the family. The result was a puny, sickly girl; and as I grew into womanhood I did not gain in health, but was afflicted with heart trouble, a weak and disordered stomach, wrecked nerves and a general breaking down till last winter, at the age of 38, I seemed to be on the verge of consumption.

"My friends greeted me with 'How bad you look! What a terrible color!' and this was not very comforting.

"The doctors and patent medicines did me absolutely no good. I was thoroughly discouraged.

"Then I gave up coffee and commenced Postum. At first I didn't like it, but after a few trials and following the directions exactly, it was grand. It was refreshing and satisfying. In a couple of weeks I noticed a great change.

"I became stronger, my brain grew clearer, I was not troubled with forgetfulness as in coffee times, my power of endurance was more than doubled.

"The heart trouble and indigestion disappeared and my nerves became steady and strong.

"I began to take an interest in things about me. Housework and homemaking became a pleasure. My friends have marveled at the change and when they enquire what brought it about I answer 'Postum, and nothing else in the world.'" Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ENDED THE SPELLING LESSON

Bobby's Education, Under Aunt's Tutelage, Afterward Proceeded Under Different Lines.

Miss Thompson, whose form nature has endowed with all-too-ample curves, was giving her little nephew a lesson in spelling the other day. He had spelt b-e, be, and h-e, he, and now she was trying to get him to tell her what m-e, spelt.

"Listen, Bobby," she said earnestly. Then closing her lips she pronounced the sound of a long m, and opening them, the sound of a long e. "What does that spell?"

Bobby looked at her and shook his head. Again she tried, and this time, while pronouncing the sounds, she vigorously tapped her own rotund chest with her plump forefinger.

"Mmm, ee. What letters am I saying and what do they spell?" she asked, still vigorously tapping her chest.

"I don't know what the letters are," replied Bobby, watching the plump forefinger, "but I guess they spell Fat."

BABY'S HAIR ALL CAME OUT

"When my first baby was six months old he broke out on his head with little bumps. They would dry up and leave a scale. Then it would break out again and it spread all over his head. All the hair came out and his head was scaly all over. Then his face broke out all over in red bumps and it kept spreading until it was on his hands and arms. I bought several boxes of ointment, gave him blood medicine, and had two doctors to treat him, but he got worse all the time. He had it about six months when a friend told me about Cuticura. I sent and got a bottle of Cuticura Resolvent, a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment. In three days after using them he began to improve. He began to take long naps and to stop scratching his head. After taking two bottles of Resolvent, two boxes of Ointment and three cakes of Soap he was sound and well, and never had any breaking out of any kind. His hair came out in little curls all over his head. I don't think anything else would have cured him except Cuticura.

"I have bought Cuticura Ointment and Cuticura Soap several times since to use for cuts and sores and have never known them to fail to cure what I put them on. Cuticura Soap is the best that I have ever used for toilet purposes." (Signed) Mrs. F. E. Harmon, R. F. D. 2, Atoka, Tenn., Sept. 10, 1910. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept L, Boston.

The RING and the MAN

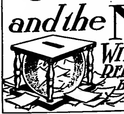
By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY



ILLUSTRATIONS BY DEARBORN MELVILL

COPYRIGHT 1909 BY MOFFAT, YARD & COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

A foolish young tenderfoot becomes fascinated with the bold, artful wife of a drunken prospector in a western mining town. They prepare to elope in a blinding blizzard but are confronted by the maudlin husband. He is shot by the wife, but the chivalrous boy pins a note to the body taking the crime upon himself. In their flight to the railroad station the woman's horse falls exhausted; the youth puts her on his own and follows hanging to the stirrup strap. Seeing he is an impediment, the woman thrusts her escort into a snow drift and rides on. Half-frozen he stumbles into the railroad station just as the train bears the woman away. Twenty-five years later, this man, George Gormly, is a multi-millionaire in New York. He meets Eleanor Haldane, a beautiful and wealthy settlement worker, and co-operates with her in her work. Gormly becomes owner of a steamship line and finds himself frustrated in pier and track extension plans by grafting aldermen, backed by the Gotham Traction company. An automobile accident brings the Haldanes to his country home. Gormly announces that he will be mayor of New York and redeem the city from corruption. The political declaration of the merchant prince produced a tremendous sensation. The whole machinery of the city's detective force is to be used to dig up something damaging to Gormly. The press heretofore unanimously favorable to the merchant candidate, under pressure, divides and the campaign waxes warm. A resolution is introduced granting a gratuitous renewal of the traction franchise. Gormly offers ten million dollars for the franchise. Miss Haldane congratulates Gormly on what she terms a new Declaration of Independence, and he makes an unexpected declaration of love. He is shocked by the confirmation of his suspicions that her father is the head and backbone of the notorious traction company which he is attempting to overthrow. Young Haldane discovers his father's connection with the Gotham Traction company, and is incensed. In an interview between Gormly and Haldane the latter practically offers his daughter's hand as a bribe for Gormly to withdraw. Gormly refuses. In an interview with Gormly Miss Haldane learns of her father's baseness though Gormly vainly tries to hide it. Members of the Ring find the woman for whose sake Gormly declared himself a murderer and decide to force him to withdraw under threat of prosecution. The chief of police visits Gormly, who makes a full confession of the truth. Young Haldane runs the gauntlet of the police and carries the confession to the newspapers for publication. By accident the newspapers find Bill Hamilton, one of the men who were at "Camp Kill Devil" and know the truth about Gormly. The Planet publishes Hamilton's story, and New York goes wild with enthusiasm for Gormly.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Continued.

"Don't you want to hear what they say about you?"

"I had rather hear what you have to say than anything in the world, and I want to tell you first of all what comfort, what pride, what satisfaction, I take in your presence here. I know you read the miserable story. Your brother had my permission to tell it to you last night, if you were awake."

"I was awake and waiting for him."

"Your interest does me much honor," continued the man, "and that you have come to me now this morning is, as I say, the greatest thing that could happen to me. I don't really care now what the world thinks. You have given me evidence enough that you still respect me."

"You don't know all the evidence yet," said the woman faintly.

She forced herself to look at him. If she had consulted her inclinations, she would have run away; but that could not be.

"Yes," said Gormly vaguely, scarcely noting her low voiced statement. "Now that it is all over and now that I have lost you, if indeed it is proper to say I had lost what I had never possessed and never could have possessed, you will understand that it was this incident to which I alluded when you said you respected me because I had been a perfectly straight, square man. Your words cut me to the heart; not because I wasn't straight or square now or that I had not made what amends I could for the actions of a boy and a fool since I had become a man, but because after this I could never persuade you or any one that I had not always been so, and because I could not bear to have even your respect on a false pretense. I wanted to tell you many times, and you know of course that if things had shaped themselves differently and you could have cared for me, I should have told you the whole story before I allowed you to say you would become—my wife."

"I am sure that you would have done so, Mr. Gormly," said the girl.

"And that you have come here to give me that assurance, to show me that you have not lost confidence in me in spite of the frightful tangle in our affairs, my antagonism to your—to the Gotham Freight Traction company and then—this. That I take it was your purpose in coming?"

"Yes," faltered the girl, "that, and—"

"What more?" asked the man. "Whatever it is, if it is in my power to give it, it is yours. What is it that you want?"

The woman opened her mouth to speak. She moistened her lips. Words apparently were difficult, perhaps impossible.

"What is it that you want, Miss Haldane?" asked Gormly again.

"I want you!" she said in her low, clear voice.

Gormly lifted his hand and stared at her.

"You want—me!" he faltered. "What do you mean?"

"I mean to be your wife," was the direct answer.

"My wife!"

"Yes. That is, if you—still—want me."

Gormly stared at her in amazement.

"Do I understand aright?" said the man, shutting his teeth together. "After all that is in the paper this morning, do you mean to say that you will marry me?"

"I do mean just that," was the answer.

"But," said the man, "you said you did not love me, and—"

"Must I do all the wooing?" cried the girl passionately.

"You offered yourself to me once before," went on Gormly relentlessly. "And you refused me. Will you do so again?"

"Why do you come to me now?"

"Can't you think of the reason?"

"I don't want to think; I want to hear."

"I love you then," said the girl resolutely. "You are the bravest, noblest, most splendid man on earth. If you will take me, I will be the happiest, proudest, thankfullest woman that the sun shines on."

"Take you!" repeated Gormly. "But I can't understand—"

"Will you understand this?" asked the girl.

She walked slowly toward him. She laid her hand on his shoulder. She lifted her face to his. His arm went around her waist. What she had begun, he finished. He swept her to him. She gave herself up yieldingly to his embrace. When his lips sought hers, there was no avoidance. Her arm slipped round his neck and tightened there. And then at last he understood. After awhile she drew away from him.

"You don't ask me what I have done?" she said.

"I neither know nor care since you are here and you are mine."

"Perhaps I should not have been here," she returned, "if we had not been already engaged and the engagement already announced."

"I am very stupid this morning," said Gormly in some bewilderment.

"You certainly are," was the answer. "For a man who aspires to be mayor of New York, you are quite the stupidest and dearest person imaginable."

"I have wit enough at least to know where I can get correct information upon all points."

"And where is that?"

"Here!" said Gormly, pressing with his own the loveliest lips in the world, which smiled at him and were not refused his touch. "What have you done and how has our engagement, which, so far as I know, was not entered into until a moment since, been announced?"

"Read that!" she cried, releasing herself from his grasp and handing him the neglected copy of The Planet.

She turned to the editorial page and pointed to a postscript to the leader of the morning, which was a discussion highly eulogistic of Gormly's action and character. The postscript was in the form of a belated communication which had been received at the office of The Planet at the last moment, and had been forced into the paper because it furnished the final and completing touch to the other revelations it contained. It had been printed in heavy black capitals, double spaced. Coming closer to her, so that he held her with one arm, Gormly took the paper with the other and read:

"The engagement of Mr. George Gormly to Miss Eleanor Haldane is authoritatively announced. The future mayor of New York is to be congratulated upon having won for his promised wife the young woman, who not only from her beauty of mind and person, but because of her lively and practical interest in the poor, the oppressed and suffering, is easily first among the daughters of our great city. The Planet feels that this announcement supplies the completing touch to the other admirable qualifications which Mr. Gormly possesses for the great office to which he has aspired and to which the people mean to see him elected tomorrow."

"Who did it?" asked Gormly.

"I did."

"But why?"

"First of all, because I found out that I loved you."

"Why did you do it last night?"

"Because I believed that such an announcement this morning, with its implication of trust, and honor, and affection, would do more to establish you in the public confidence than almost anything that could be imagined."

"You have made my election certain. But whether you have or not, I could almost believe that winning you I don't care."

"Don't say that," interrupted the woman, delighted nevertheless at this splendid declaration.

"Your father and mother, do they know?"

"Certainly. I told them at breakfast this morning."

"How did they take it?"

"You can imagine what my mother thought and said," answered the girl, smiling faintly.

"And your father?"

She sighed deeply.

"My father, I imagine, is not unwilling to have a friend at court. What are you going to do when you are elected?"

"Marry you the first thing."

"I mean after that."

"Live to make you happy."

"Do be reasonable! I mean what are you going to do with the opposition?"

"I am going to do justly and fairly by all men, whoever they are, whatever they may have done. Mine shall be no policy of ruin. Some things must be broken down; but my aim shall be to upbuild."

"I thought so," returned the girl. "And what are you going to do with the one woman?"

"I am going to love her as no woman was ever loved before in this world."

How long this might have continued can never be told. Young Haldane interrupted them.

"Mr. Gormly," he said, "I see you have heard the news."

"I have heard the essential part of it from your sister."

"Do you mean to tell me that you haven't read the paper yet? Well, sit down and read it, or I'll withdraw my influence and vote against you. I suppose all Eleanor told you was the news of her engagement?"

"Well, wasn't that enough?"

"Enough!" cried the young man. "Why, you want to read the interview with Col. Bill Hamilton. It's the finest thing that ever appeared. Everybody knows that you didn't shoot the man, but that the woman did. They know, too, that you gave her your horse in the snow and that she abandoned you. Why, man, you're a hero!"

"To be perfectly frank with you, Haldane, this is all most interesting and gratifying. How on earth Bill Hamilton turned up at the right moment and told the truth, I don't know; but as a matter of fact, I do truly care more for your sister's action and I get more satisfaction out of the fact that I am going to be married to her immediately after the election than I will in winning, if we win."

"You are sure to win," said Haldane.

"I told you not to say that," said the girl to her lover.

"Now read the paper, and then we'll go uptown."

What more is there to tell? Miss Haldane, in view of the new relationship between them, boldly rode up to the auditorium in the great store by the side of Gormly in the tonneau of her brother's big car. The enormous crowd that filled the great hall to overflowing, that packed the streets outside, that suspended all traffic; the addresses that Gormly made; the frantic cheering that greeted him as he stood overlooking the greatest multitude that had ever filled that section of Broadway, Miss Haldane on one side and his old friend of a quarter of a century back, Col. Bill Hamilton, on the other, with Haldane, Whitefield and a great galaxy of supporters in the background, including Abbott, the cub reporter, scribbling like mad on the greatest story of the day—these have all passed into history. The result of the election, which occurred next day, is of course known to everybody.

"It is over," he said, "and we have won!"

"Yes. No one congratulates you as I."

"I have a great deal to live up to," was the slow answer.

"As mayor of New York?" she questioned softly.

"As your husband," he replied.

THE END.

Why Girls Excel in Study

Early Development of Their Perceptive Faculties Required by Their Weaker Physical State.

The superiority of female students, both children and adults, has been mentioned and explained hundreds of times, and yet the full pedagogic significance of the fact still seems to be ignored. The girls in many a coeducational college furnish an overwhelming percentage of the best students, and yet in later years the men take the lead in every one of the lines in which as boys they were so backward. It is all due to the well known fact that in her weaker physical state self-protection has demanded an early development of the perceptive faculties. Age for age, girls perceive understandingly what boys scarcely notice. The differences between the two sexes are so great that it is unscientific to class them together, and there is a growing suspicion that each is injured by current co-educational method, the boys unduly stimulated and the girls retarded. In spite of this self-evident conclusion pedagogues seem bent upon the impossible task of making the boys keep up with the girls—a plan sure to be followed by far-reaching bad results. The boys are liable to become discouraged, while the girls are led to embark upon careers as wage earners in professions in which failure is inevitable.—American Medicine.

The Hampton Court Maze.

Ninety-eight thousand persons have paid a penny each for admission to the famous maze at Hampton Court palace this summer, the largest number for some years. It is estimated that about 25 per cent. of these were foreigners, mostly French and German. During August 24,000 people passed through the turnstiles. For a number of years the takings at the maze were the perquisites of one of the palace attendants, upon whom the right to collect and retain them was conferred by the late Queen Victoria. Since his death a few days ago the takings have gone to his majesty's office of works.—London Standard.

Accommodating.

"Mrs. Weeds," said Mr. Binks, "I asked your daughter to marry me, and she referred me to you."

"I'm sure that's very kind of Susie, but then she always was a dutiful girl. Really, Mr. Binks, I hadn't thought of marrying again at my time of life, but since you insists, suppose we make the wedding-day the twentieth of this month."

44 Bu. to the Acre

is a heavy yield, but that's what John Kennedy of Edmonton, Alberta, Western Canada, got from 40 acres of Spring Wheat in 1910. Reports from other districts in that province showed other excellent results—such as 4,000 bushels of wheat from 120 acres, or 33 1-3 bu. per acre. 25, 30 and 40 bushel yields were numerous. As high as 132 bushels of oats to the acre were threshed from Alberta fields in 1910.

at the recent Spokane Fair was awarded to the Alberta Government for its exhibit of grains, grasses and vegetables. Reports of excellent yields for 1910 come also from Saskatchewan and Manitoba in Western Canada.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879.

Back up into your hole, Hunt, your day doesn't come until Feb. 2, this year.—Thief River Falls Times:

Never mind Mussey, Hunt will not only have Feb. 2, but several other days before he gets through with you and the "gang" you are hacking.

White Earth lake is to be stocked with white pike by the U.S. fish commission on the recommendation of Congressman Steenerson, —Norman County Index.

We wonder if Congressman Steenerson could not get some of these fish to restock Red Lake River to take the place the fish that the lumber companys killed this winter by jaming up the outlet of Red Lake with logs.

GUESS WHO WINS.

The Red Lake Falls Gazette, answers the Eleven Towns article regarding the putting in of a dam at the outlet of Red Lake, saying they are only partly correct in opposing it. The Gazette says:

"It is true that the efforts of the settlers to secure justice has been defeated, but for them to fight the proposition for river improvement would be to work against their own interest."

The Gazette would not say that, if the editor had lived up on the upper part of Red Lake River a few years and had seen the devlish workings of the lumber companys, backed up by that Engineers office at St. Paul.

The Eleven Town is right, and all the lumber companys are working for now is to get that dam put in there and get it under the control of that dam Engineers outfit at St. Paul, which would save them the expense of hireing men to go up and plug the river, as they did last year.

Then when they got ready to drive their logs they would open up that d— dam, and flood the whole country under the supervision of that engineer outfit, and when the river was low they will close down Mr. dam and hold back what water there is in the lake, as they did last year, until they get another big head on, then look out for an other flood.

The settlers living along this river are mostly men who have lived here for seven years, and they will not soon forget this last outrage of the lumber company, of shutting off the river and depriveing them of water for their stock and murdering the millions of fish, but as has been before stated they will never make another complaint to that Engineers outfit at St. Paul, so the lumber companys can take this for their notice and discharge their servants, for they will have no further use for them.

We do not know yet that the people have lost in their fight for justice, but if them logs are allowed to remain in that outlet of Red Lake until the spring floods wash them out and turn the lake loose onto us and distroy our meadows and crops, THE LUMBER COMPANY'S HAVE WON, and THE PEOPLE have lost. Then the next move will be made on the chess board.

Progress Of Socialism.

Last weeks Crookston Times has quite a lengthly editorial on the "Progress of Socialism," in which they say:

"We analyze the situation briefly as follows: If the people can not get justice in any other way, they will vote with the Socialist with utter disregard of what the result would be. Rather than to submit to unreasonable domination, or be dictated to by any power they will revolt and Socialism will score still greater victories.

Wise is that political leader who does not shut his eyes to the handwriting on the wall, and who will fight for those principals which the people are demanding of their public servants and if the demands of the people are not granted, then it will serve the stiff necked reprobates exactly right if Socialism does sweep over the land."

How true the above is, when you apply it to the closing up of Red Lake River by a lumber company, and be protected in doing it by the engineers of this government at St Paul. That "outfit" are likely to drive "Appeal to Reason" out of business, and if they continue to do as good a business in the future as they have done in the past, they had ought to hang out their sign, of "SOCIALIST MANUFACTURING CO. Then some of the politicians will wonder what ails the people that they are turning to Socialist's. They think the people don't know, but they DO know.

THE SUNBEAM.

Sunbeam Minn.

Gentelmen:

Under date of January 20, 1912, the Commissioner of the General Land Office forwards to us a copy of his letter of the same date addressed to Congressman Steenerson, relative to the statutory life of entries in the "Eleven Towns."

This ruling considerably modifies the construction heretofore placed on the regulations governing entries in this area and we desire to give the matter such publicity as will correct wrong impressions.

The letter is as follows;

Department of the Interior.
General Land Office,
Washington Januar 20, 1912.

Hon. H. Steenerson,
House of Representatives

My dear Mr. Steenerson:

I am in reciept of your letter of the 16th inst. asking for information relative to the statutory life of homestead edtries made under the act of February 20, 1904, (33Stat. 46), for ceded Red Lake Indian Reservation land, it appearing that there is considerably uncertainty among such entryman, by reason of the two acts extending the time with which the installment payments might be made.

One of these extensions was granted by the act of March 26, 1910 (36Stat. 265) which allowed two additional time.

You will probably remember that sometime after the passage of this act, the matter was taken up personally by the Commissioner with Senator Nelson and yourself, and your attention was directed to the fact that the act would probably fail to afford relief to many of the very persons in whose behalf it was enacted, who had made entries during the first sale, and even with the two years additional time, would still be in defalt in their installment payments.

It was then stated that the act would be construed by this office to grant two years additional time from its date, thus extending the time, within which payments might be made, to March 26, 1912, and letters subsequently written by this office are doubtless the basis on which the local officers have advised entryman that the statutory life of their entries will expire on March 26, 1912.

The first extention act affecting these lands was that of June 28, 1906 (34Stat. 325, 325), which applied with some exceptions, to ceded Indian Reservation lands generally in Minnesota. The instructions thereunder were, of cource, generall in nature, and it was stated that the extention of time for making payments involved a corresponding time in which to make final proof. However, in the case of the Red Lake lands, an extentions of time to make proof did not necessarily follow, as, while it was required that the installment payments be completed within five years from the date of sale proof was permitted to be made within six years from date of sale, consequently, the extention of time to make payments simply made the time, within which payments might be made, identical with the statutory life of the entry.

Construing the act of March 26, 1910, as granting two years additional to the time already allowed by law, within which the installment payments might be made, and as proof and payment, as the law then stood, were required to be made at the same time, and within six years from date of sale the said act necessary carried with it an extention of time of two years, within which proof need be made on entries affected thereby, and in all such cases the statutory life of the entry would eight years from its date. Therefore, while this office has, as stated, construed said act to grant relief in those cases where such relief is necessary, manifestly it does not follow that the statutory life of any entry is shortened by reason of said act.

To summarize: Though an entryman may be in defalt, as the law stands, as to his installments payments, and his entry be subject to cancellation for that reason, any entryman under the act of February 20, 1904, would be allowed eight years from the date of his entry, within which to submit final proof, in the absence of any other objection.

The foregoing will also be responsive to your letter of the 17th Instant, and the communication therein inclosed from Mr. E. A. Mostue, dated January 12, 1912, is herewith retuened.

Very respectfully,
S.V. PROUPFIT
Assistant Commissioner.

Siam's Amazon Guard.

Siam is one of the few conntries which boast of a corps of women police. The members of this amazon guard are all old and ugly. They wear uniforms, though they are not armed. Their chief duty is to act as gate keepers of the inner, or women's, palace at Bangkok. They follow any stranger who enters the palace and remain with him until he takes his departure. Men who have business inside the palace—doctors, architects, carpenters, electric light fitters, etc. enter the palace freely. But are always accompanied by some of the Amazon guard. The palace has some dificulty in recruiting these guards, as the work is hard and the pay poor, and the qualification—nucomplimentary.—London Standard.

SOME LOG JAM.

Red Lake River As It Is.

Owing to the many different statements that have been mads nboat the the log jams in Red Laka Rive, we employed a rellable man to make an examination and make an affidavit of the condition of the river as it is, and here it is:

Marshell Shed, first being duly sworn says:

I made a personal examination of the Red Lake River from the ontlet of the Lake down the river for a distance of 18 miles. There was a large number of large logs lying at the edge of the lake, reaching about 4 or 5 rods out into the lake.

The first log jam is in the river abont 20 rods down the river from the outlet. In this jam the logs are solid together and many of them are crosswise, and at the upper part of the jam they are now two tier deep ebove the water.

From the edge of the lake to the log jam I measured tne water in three different places. The first place at the edge of the lake was 2 feet deep for the entire width of the river. About 10 rods below the lake I measured it again and found it four feet deep. A little further down, about half way from the edge of the lake to the log jam, I measured and fonnd it 4 3-4 feet deep. This jem is about one half mile long, and is a solid jam of logs from bank to benk of the river. Near the lower end of this jam the logs are lying on the bottom of the river.

The next log jam is ebont 40 rods below this first jam, and also fills the river solid full of logs for about a distance of 80 rods.

The 3rd jam is about 1½ miles below the second jem, and the river is solid full of logs from bank to bank for a distance of about ½ mile. The river has started to flow around this jam near the north bank but is now frozen over.

The 4th, jem is ebout two miles below the 3rd, jam and is about 40 rods long and is a solid jam, at the lower end. The water had started to flow over the bank around this jam. but is now frozen solid so there is no water flowing there now.

The 5th and 6th jams are not so large but the 7th jam, down a distance of about 8 miles from the outlet, is about 3-4 of a mile long and the lugs are packed solid together, and at the lower end of the jam they are lying on the bottom of tho river. (the lumber companys wanagans are at this point.)

I do not believe a minow fish could get thru this log jam for the logs are packed solid togather. When walking down the river I could tell when I was nearing a log jam by noting how the water had heaved and broken the lee by raising after the water had frozen.

I followed the river for a distance of about 18 miles down to the storage boom near Leslins plaeo and there was logs all the way, but there was no jams at this point.

OUR MOTHER TONGUE.

An Expressive Sentence in Which It Was Badly Twisted.

The professor of English, who was taking a vacation trip on horseback through the hills, had occasion to make notes of a good many quaint and interesting expressions employed by the sturdy mountaineers. The one that pleased him most was a striking use of the little word "but."

The party had ridden for hours and had not found a single inn. They were hungry, and one of the guides suggested that it might be possible to get a bite to eat at one of the mountaineers' huts.

"I know you can get corn bread there," he said.

The professor volunteered to go with the guide to a hut high upon the mountain side in quest of the corn bread. A dilapidated garden fence surrounded the hut, and when the gate squeaked on its hinges a dog began barking. Simultaneously a fat woman edged her way through the door and approached the men at the gate.

"What d' yo'all want?" she called.

"Madam," said the professor, "would you be so kind as to tell us whether we can get any corn bread here?"

"Corn bread!"

"Yes, corn bread," he repeated. "We'd like to buy some of you if you have any."

"Corn bread? Corn bread, did yo' say?" Then she chuckled to herself, and her manner grew more amiable. "Why, if corn bread's all yo' want, come right in, for that's just what I hain't got nothing else on hand but."—Boston Herald.

THE ROCK PTARMIGAN.

A Bird of Storms and Ice, Raw Mists and Bleak Winds.

In order to make the acquaintance of the ptarmigan it is necessary either to journey into the snows and ice of the far north or to climb up to the very highest glacier valleys among the frozen peaks of the Rockies or Cascades, where circumpolar conditions are reproduced. While this curious bird is essentially a subarctic type, it is occasionally found among the isolated fields of eternal snow as far south as Colorado and northern New Mexico.

The rock ptarmigan is a bird of storms and ice and raw mists and bleak winds, in the summer gray as the rocks among which he lives, in winter white as the whirling snows in the midst of which he survives after every other feathered living thing, save only the fearless eagle, has fled to the lower valleys.

His brother, the willow ptarmigan, lives lower down by 500 or 1,000 feet, among the dwarfed shrubs which mark the upper edges of tree life, and, while similar in size and structure, is of a less somber plumage and more friendly disposition than the ghostly gray specter of the upper world, the rock ptarmigan. The males of the willow ptarmigan especially are beautiful birds; brownish gray upon the backs and wings, with rich reddish brown throats almost chestnut in color and dazzling white breasts.—Country Life in America.

Keeping the Boys and Girls on the Farm

RECEIVING PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION FROM HIS ELDERS

GROUP OF FARMER GIRLS AT AN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE—BASKET BALL TEAM

STUDENTS AT AN AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE

JUVENILE OYSTER FARMERS

IN these days when the public prints and the popular mind are filled with the subject of the "back to the soil" crusade which has been sweeping over the country it might be supposed that the enthusiasm for farm life was universal. And yet, oddly enough, the problem of keeping the boys and girls on the farm is, in some sections of the country, only little less acute than it was a few years ago when the cities bade fair to drain the rural districts of all the best of its young blood. However, it is only fair to say that the crisis has been passed in this drift from the country to the city. The tide has turned not only as shown by the migration of many city folk countryward, but yet more significantly by the growing content with which an increasing proportion of the young people who have been born and reared in the country elect to remain in their native environment when the time comes for them to strike out for themselves.

It should be pointed out, just here, though, that the considerations that are prompting an increased percentage of rural youth to stay by the time-honored vocation of their forefathers are not all the purely sentimental ones that influence so many city folks to seek the country as a place of residence. It is undoubtedly true that the average individual is prone to under-estimate the advantages and exaggerate the disadvantages of his own situation and environment. And it is equally true that "far away fields look green," literally as well as figuratively speaking. Consequently the city resident, sick of stuffy apartments and noisy, dirty streets, working for a wage or salary, is prone to find a dream of paradise in the prospect of being his own boss in the cool, quiet country. The country girl or boy, on the other hand, must inevitably look at the situation through the opposite end of the telescope. He or she is familiar from experience with the hard work of the farm which the inexperienced city dweller has given scarce a thought to in advance and many of the distractions of city life which have palled on the urban resident who turns his eyes farmward possess the charm of novelty for the untraveled young people of the farm.

Boys and Girls Sticking to the Farm.

That despite this state of affairs a constantly increasing proportion of the country girls and boys are choosing to stick by the farms is highly significant and betokens a change of material conditions as well as an altered mental state. And, speaking of material things, or had we better say financial conditions, it might as well be put down first and foremost that one of the main factors in inducing country bred youth to remain in the country is the increased prosperity that has come in recent years to tillers of the soil. In the old days when almost every farm was heavily mortgaged and the son or daughter of the household saw little ahead but a life-time struggle with debt it was no wonder that they turned to paths where life, if not easier, was certainly more pleasant and allowed a more equal division of the time between work and play.

But now, with the farms on a sound, profitable basis and the average rural couple able to start their married life on a farm of their own,—wholly or partially paid for,—there is not so much attraction in the jobs which the city affords the unskilled worker,—the $12 or $15 a week at which the street car conductor must start or the $5 or $8 a week that is offered to the new recruit among the shop girls of the big city stores. Even if a country youth is allured by the lights and life and glamor and gaiety of the large city he is now compelled by that sound, practical common sense which is the heritage of the average farmer boy, to stop and consider whether it is worth the sacrifice demanded in dollars and cents, to say nothing of the sacrifice of health, to which perhaps he gives nary a thought.

Prosperity Has Brought Improved Conditions.

The farmers who have given serious thought to the problems of keeping their girls and boys with them or near them on the farms have been quick to appreciate the advantages of the improved conditions of recent years and they have followed up the advantage that prosperity has given them by making it easy for a young man to get title to a tract of his own or for the daughter of a household to have a dowry of broad acres when she marries. We can all remember how the farmer of yesterday, even if he was pretty "well fixed," thought that his son ought to be perfectly content if he had a showy turnout in which to take his best girl for the traditional Sunday afternoon ride. Ideals have changed rapidly in this respect and a great light has broken in upon the wide-awake farmers. The prosperous tiller of the soil has come to realize that if he wishes to have his son remain in the neighborhood he must either give him a tangible interest in the home place or else arrange matters so that the young man can strike out as master of his own holding, even though it be a comparatively small one to start with.

Rural Free Delivery of Much Benefit.

Much has been said regarding the extent to which the rural free delivery of U. S. mail has contributed to keeping boys and girls on the farm and its influence has probably not been exaggerated. For all that the average young farmer prizes the boon of receiving his daily paper on the same day on which it is printed, it is probable that rural free delivery has meant even more to the young women than it has to the young men.

The circulating rural libraries have been another contributor to content on the farms and so have the rural telephones which enable the young people to keep in close touch with one another and enable them to arrange social festivities on short notice,—something that was absolutely impossible under the old conditions when every farmhouse was more or less isolated from all the other dwellings of the country side. The advent of the modern musical instruments has been another tremendous help in rendering the country young people self-sufficient. The player piano has done wonders but perhaps the greatest transformation has been wrought by the modern graphophones, phonographs and talking machines with the facilities they afford for ready-made concerts and recitals of sacred music and accompaniments for singing in the home and dance music for the frolics in barn or parlor.

The latest and one of the most potent of all the contributors to content in rural communities is the moving picture. The time will come when every farm household can have its nightly moving picture entertainment in its own home (enjoying the delights of foreign travel and the relaxation of funny plays) but in the meantime the installation of moving picture shows in every town and village has given the rural young people the best kind of a substitute for the one form of amusement that in the past they thought could only be had in the cities.

The moving picture fad has also made it possible for the young people to enjoy an evening of relaxation, whenever they happened to feel in the mood or whenever the state of the weather is favorable to a drive "to town." In the old days the opera house in the average small town had a theatrical attraction not more than once or twice a week, and even if the young people on the farm could make it convenient to make the trip on such an occasion they were more than likely to be confronted with "The Two Orphans" or "Ten Nights in the Bar Room" or "East Lynne" or "Uncle Tom's Cabin" or some other classic that they had seen so many times that they knew the story backward and forward. Now we have the moving pictures open every night with a nightly change of the little plays on their programs. Their programs are concluded, too, at an hour that enables the farm young people to be at home and in bed in reasonable season and finally this innocent amusement costs only a fraction what a visit to the "town hall" or the opera house did in the old days when the traveling troupes held sway.

To jump at one bound from the frivolous to the serious, it may be noted that our modern agricultural colleges are also doing a tremendous work in keeping the young people on the farm. First of all, they give to the farmer boy and girl an added appreciation and respect for the vocation which awaits them and incidently kindle ambition by disclosing how much money can be made in farming if the farmer will get down to business and use scientific, progressive methods. Quite aside from this consideration however is the one that after a three or four year course at an agricultural college, with all sorts of excursions and social festivities on the side, a farmer lad or lassie is more likely to have had his or her "fill" of such diversions and be ready to come back home and settle down to the serious business of life than is the country-bred junior who has never been off the farm and has never had any opportunity to gratify that love of a good time that is instinctive with all young people.

A Sad Event.

The irrepressible "Tody" Hamilton, who is held to know as much about circuses as any human being could, tells of the misfortunes of an Ohio man who attempted to pilot a "one-tent show" through the middle west.

This owner lost a number of valuable animals, by accident and otherwise; so that it was with considerable sympathy that one of his keepers undertook the task of "breaking gently to the old man" the news of further disaster. The keeper accomplished this with much tact, as follows:

"Mr. Morgan, you remember that laffin' hyena in cage No. 8?"

"Remember the laughing hyena?" repeated the owner. "What the deuce are you driving at?"

"Simply this, Mr. Morgan: He ain't got nothin' to laugh at this mornin'."—Lippincott's.

Prove that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Does Restore the Health of Ailing Women.

Boston, Mass.—"I was passing through the Change of Life and suffered from hemorrhages (sometimes lasting for weeks), and could get nothing to check them. I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound (tablet form) on Tuesday, and the following Saturday morning the hemorrhages stopped. I have taken them regularly ever since and am steadily gaining.

"I certainly think that every one who is troubled as I was should give your Compound Tablets a faithful trial, and they will find relief."—Mrs. GEORGE JUBY, 803 Fifth Street, South Boston, Mass.

Letter from Mrs. Julia King, Phœnix, R.I.

Phœnix, R.I.—"I worked steady in the mill from the time I was 13 years old until I had been married a year, and I think that caused my bad feelings. I had soreness in my side near my left hip that went around to my back, and sometimes I would have to lie in bed for two or three days. I was not able to do my housework.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped me wonderfully in every way. You may use my letter for the good of others. I am only too glad to do anything within my power to recommend your medicine."—Mrs. JULIA KING, Box 282, Phœnix, R.I.

Letter from Mrs. Etta Donovan, Willimantic, Conn.

Willimantic, Conn.—"For five years I suffered untold agony from female troubles causing backache, irregularities, dizziness, and nervous prostration. It was impossible for me to walk up stairs without stopping on the way. I was all run down in every way.

"I tried three doctors and each told me something different. I received no benefit from any of them but seemed to suffer more. The last doctor said it was no use for me to take anything as nothing would restore me to health again. So I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to see what it would do, and by taking seven bottles of the Compound and other treatment you advised, I am restored to my natural health."—Mrs. ETTA DONOVAN, 762 Main Street, Willimantic, Conn.

Letter from Mrs. Winfield Dana, Augusta, Me.

Augusta, Me.—"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has cured the backache, headache, and the bad pain I had in my right side, and I am perfectly well."—Mrs. WINFIELD DANA, R.F.D. No. 2, Augusta, Me.

Letter from Mrs. J. A. Thompson, Newport, Vt.

Newport, Vt.—"I thank you for the great benefit Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done me. I took eight bottles and it did wonders for me, as I was a nervous wreck when I began taking it. I shall always speak a good word for it to my friends."—Mrs. JOHN A. THOMPSON, Box 3, Newport Center, Vermont.

Letter from Miss Grace Dodds, Bethlehem, N.H.

Bethlehem, N.H.—"By working very hard, sweeping carpets, washing, ironing, lifting heavy baskets of clothes, etc., I got all run down. I was sick in bed every month.

"This last Spring my mother got Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for me, and already I feel like another girl. I am regular and do not have the pains that I did, and do not have to go to bed. I will tell all my friends what the Compound is doing for me."—Miss GRACIE B. DODDS, Box 133, Bethlehem, N.H.

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself who will not try this famous medicine, made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.

AGENT IS ATTACKED

E. B. LINNEN, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT OFFICER, SAYS RED MEN VICTIMIZED.

SEVERAL ARE ABSENT

Congressman Mondell Would Resign From Sub-Committee Now Here—Favoritism Charged to Simon Michelet While Agent.

Minneapolis, Minn. — The tempo- Minneapolis, Jan. 27.—The temporary absence of several witnesses who are wanted by the representatives of the department of justice for testimony relating to the four township timber sales at Crookston in 1900 and the alleged combine of bidders there, gave a new turn to the department's case at the Indian hearing before the congressional investigating committee.

The department representatives undertook to show that congressional legislation since 1900 had in its chronological order given lumber interests an opportunity to increase their grasp on reservation timber.

That it gave opportunity for unfair treatment of a part of the Indians on the reservation was a supposition advanced and supported by a report of Edward B. Linnan, an interior department officer, which had never before been made public.

In the report old charges were revived against Simon Michelet, former agent of the White Earth reservation. Gus Beaulieu and Ben Fairbanks were declared to have failed to discriminate between mixed and full bloods in making purchases of timber, and other employes of the agency were charged with questionable practices, J. E. Perrault and J. T. Van Metre being named.

Charges Against Michelet.

The charges against Michelet were that he had favored Indians, whom the report did not name, in the allotment of the additional 80-acre tracts under the Steenerson act; that he had sold a government lot on the reservation on which a reservation was situated for $35; had sold copies of government records and made copies of tract books showing all lands and allotments on the reservation; and that he had allotted the government saw mill reserve on the reservation to favored individuals.

Voluminous correspondence between officers and men of the reservation and officials of the department of the interior was read to show the course of action taken by the department and its inspectors with regard to the reservation scandals, particularly the charges of favoritism to individual Indians in the making of allotments following the Steenerson act. A report by Inspector James McLaughlin to the secretary of the interior commending the conduct of Michelet at the time of the sale of timber under the Steenerson act, was read by Mr. O'Brien. Mr. Burch said after the hearing that an endeavor would be made to impeach the report.

Mr. Graham made public a letter from Representative Frank W. Mondell of Wyoming, in which his resignation from the sub-committee sitting in Minneapolis was offered. Mr. Graham replied that he had not the power to accept the resignation, but must leave it to the entire committee.

Michelet Denies Charges.

Simon Michelet was disinclined to discuss at length the statements made in the investigation, pending a completion of the hearing, except to enter an emphatic denial.

"I don't know that I care to discuss the matter," he said. "It is easy, by insinuation, to bring men's names into a case and in such a way that a reflection is conveyed. There appears to be a disposition to drag in everybody and everything in order to make up a case, regardless of whether the statements can be substantiated or not. So far as I am concerned, the records show for themselves. When the testimony is all in, it will be clear there is nothing to these insinuations."

SHORT COURSE A SUCCESS

Keen Interest at West Concord in Lectures and Demonstrations.

West Concord.—The West Concord agricultural short course closed on Saturday. The lectures and demonstrations were well attended. Professor Olson of the state university and Mr. Griswold of La Crosse were the lecturers. The work consisted of corn score card practice, testing and grading seed corn, corn planting and cultivation, varieties for planting, silos and silage, corn as a rotation crop; study of dairy type, dairy feeding, dairy judging, dairy barn construction, farm management and community breeding. An hour each day was devoted to conference work. Miss Bull, of the state university, gave lectures and demonstrations in domestic science to the women of the vicinity.

PLAN LARGE MEETING

Program Announced for State Y. M. C. A. Convention At Winona.

Winona.—The complete program for the thirty-eighth annual convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Minnesota, to be held at Winona February 8 to 11, has been issued by State Secretary Edward W. Pack. Most of the associations will send delegates to the meeting.

The state officers are planning to make the convention the largest of its kind ever held in the state. The theme of the meeting is announced as follows: "Men and Religion. Its Present Significance." The speakers will take up the various phases of the association's work, which includes Bible study, social service, boys' work, missions, the church and evangelism.

The executive committee has announced the following speakers for the convention: Henry Churchill King, D. D., president of Oberlin college; Clyde R. Joy of Keokuk, chairman of the national finance committee and the Men and Religion Forward movement; Dr. George J. Fisher of New York, international secretary of the physical department of the Y. M. C. A., James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of St. Mark's church at Minneapolis; William J. Robinson of Chicago, president of a large Illinois corporation and a great helper of the Y. M. C. OUT OF PEN—IN JAIL

Former Stillwater Inmate Held at East Grand Forks for Fraud.

East Grand Forks.—Although free from the Stillwater penitentiary less than two weeks, Albert Parsons is again in jail here and faces another term, the charge against him being that of obtaining money under false pretenses. Parsons is accused of operating a telephone game, extracting money from several East Grand Forks business men by using the names of prominent farmers in the district, asking them to give Parsons a small amount of cash and that they would pay the amount back when they came into the city. Between ten and fifteen are said to have been fleeced in this manner.

Parsons served the penitentiary sentence for forgery, and was convicted in this county.

CARIBOU NOT EXTINCT

Duluth Man Fined for Having Heads of Pair Shot in State.

St. Paul.—Statements that the caribou is extinct in Minnesota have been disproved by agents of the state game and fish commission. Word was received in the office of the commission in St. Paul that O. F. Alhine of Duluth has been fined $100 for having two caribou heads in his possession. The caribou were shot near the Canadian line in eastern Minnesota.

Fire Routs Fifty Families.

Minneapolis. — Fifty families fled from a three-story brick tenement on Nicollet island, when a fire broke out in the basement flat of Rev. Mr. Lewis. Women seized their children and many, half dressed, in the midst of the afternoon toilet, ran into the street. Smoke poured through the windows and up the stairs, filling the entire building. Spontaneous combustion in a pile of coal and wood in the basement started the fire. The fire department extinguished the flames before any damage was done.

DULUTH IS CALLED LOSER

SAYS TWIN CITIES BENEFITS BY LAKE AND GRAIN RATES.

Minneapolis, Not Being Ready to Testify, Secures Adjournment to Washington.

Duluth, Minn., Jan. 27.—At the resumption of testimony in the lake-and-rail case before Commissioner James Harlan before the interstate commerce commission, G. Roy Hall, traffic expert for the traffic commission of the Duluth Commercial club, submitted data intended to prove that the natural head of the lakes commercially had been moved 150 miles inland to Minneapolis and St. Paul. Duluth, he alleged, had been discriminated against by a 15c differential "since the building of the first railroad into this territory"—the old Lake Superior & Mississippi railroad which was organized, he inferred, by Minneapolis capital, and defaulted in 1875. This line made the 15c differential and it has come down that way to the present time, he stated.

Because of this 15c differential Minneapolis and St. Paul have had an enormous commercial advantage over Duluth, he continued. Because this condition has existed for many years, Mr. Hall went on, there seemed no reason why it should continue.

He attacked the "free storage of freight in railroad warehouses which has become an institution" and asked that the custom be abolished.

"The city of Duluth asks the commission to ignore the cry of the railroads, the boat lines, and the Twin City jobbers of 'Let Us Alone,'" he said.

"The whole scheme of lake-and-rail rates is fictitious," he averred.

Duluth's case was brought to an end yesterday. Summed up it is that the whole structure of lake-and-rail rates is discriminating against Duluth and preferential to the Twin Cities.

Subpoenas are out for rate men of western railroads, but they have not been found.

The hearing was adjourned until Feb. 16, at Washington.

Duluth had submitted its testimony and had presented its exhibits when Minneapolis, claiming they were not ready, asked for an adjournment.

Commissioner Harlan then stated that if the case were not of such vital importance he would demand that the Minneapolis testimony be put in here and now, but that he believed the commerce commission would not want him to force such an issue. Therefore he adjourned the hearing until Feb. 16 at Washington, when Minneapolis will give its testimony.

ARRESTED IN WINONA

Martin Lahana Charged With Robbing Mail Pouch.

Winona.—Martin Lehane, a fugitive for three weeks, who was wanted by the local police and federal inspectors in connection with the theft of a mail pouch at the St. Paul railway station here, was arrested at his home after making a desperate attempt to escape.

Lehane left the city immediately after the disappearance of the mail bag, beat his way to St. Paul and thence to Chicago. He has had a severe experience during the recent cold weather. His feet and hands are frozen. Lehane returned to the home of his parents tonight and a short time later the residence was surrounded by the police. When he dashed from the house he was subdued and taken to the station. The police believe he will be able to explain the disappearance of the valuable mail bag from the station platform, although he denies all knowledge of the theft.

NOT ALTOGETHER HIS FAULT

Verdict Brought In by Jury Certainly Was Not Flattering to the Accused.

A Wheeling (W. Va.) lawyer says that he has heard many queer verdicts in his time, but the quaintest of these was that brought in not long ago by a jury of mountaineers in a sparsely settled part of that state.

This was the first case for the majority of the jury, and they sat for hours arguing and disputing over it in the bare little room at the rear of the court room. At last they straggled back to their places, and the foreman, a lean, gaunt fellow, with a superlatively solemn expression, voiced the general opinion:

"The jury don't think that he done it, for we allow he wa'n't there, but we think he would have done it ef he'd had the chanst."—Harper's Magazine.

To CONSOLIDATE OUR NAVY YARDS

THE secretary of the U. S. navy, backed by that coterie of experienced officers who are his counselors, has been cherishing for the past year or two an important new scheme which many persons believe congress will be compelled to indorse,—ultimately if not in the immediate future. The new scheme is nothing less than a project for consolidating a number of our navy yards and thus eliminating a considerable portion of the industrial plants now scattered along our seacoasts as outfitting and repair stations for Uncle Sam's war craft. Various advantages are claimed for the new method of managing things, but one of the principal arguments, as may be surmised, is that it will enable the government to save a lot of money every year.

Action by the congress of the United States is required before this proposal can be carried out in anything like its full scope, but already a beginning has been made in line with the new policy. Thus we see two navy yards, those at New Orleans and Pensacola, Florida, virtually abandoned save for caretakers, and the work which was formerly done there transferred to other plants in the south where, with the larger forces of workmen available, it can be handled more expeditiously. If the officials have their way the navy yards at San Juan, Port Royal, New London, Sacketts Harbor, Culebra and Cavite will also be abandoned in short order. But of course this is easier said than done, for no town or city wants to see its navy yard abandoned any more than it wants to see one of its local manufacturing plants removed to some rival city and consequently each community thus affected can be depended upon to fight the proposal through members of congress and any other national authorities upon whom influence can be brought to bear.

To appreciate the position of the naval officials on this mooted question it is necessary to bear in mind the functions of a navy yard, as they regard them. The head of the navy department contends that navy yards are primarily for use in time of war and only incidently for use in time of peace. They are supposed to be establishments for the docking, repair and refitting of war vessels and not, ordinarily, plants for the construction of new warships although Uncle Sam has from time to time constructed a number of warships in his navy yards and is building battleships in navy yards at the present time. The function of navy yards, therefore is to maintain the efficiency of the ships of the fighting fleet and they should be placed at strategic points. The officials contend that we have considerably more navy yards than the requirements of the fleet justify.

The secretary of the navy recently did some investigating to ascertain how Uncle Sam compared in possessions of this kind with the leading foreign powers and the result will surprise many people. It was disclosed that the United States has twice as many first-class home navy yards as are possessed by Great Britain, although John Bull has a navy about double the size of ours and that, furthermore, we have one more navy yard of the second class than Great Britain has. In other words we have eleven first and second class navy yards in the United States while Great Britain is worrying along with six of the same kind. Germany has three, and France five. Doubtless our far-flung coast line on two oceans, to say nothing of the Gulf of Mexico, has been largely responsible for our prodigal investments in navy yards.

All the same this pre-eminence in navy yards has cost Uncle Sam a pretty penny since he began to acquire such holdings more than a century ago. The sites for some of our navy yards and naval stations (also coaling stations) were gifts, but Uncle Sam had to pay good hard cash for most of them and in the aggregate such first investments totaled the tidy sum of nearly three million dollars. But that was but a drop in the bucket compared to the expense of equipping and maintaining these bee hives of activity. Indeed the total cost for buildings, improvements, machinery, etc., for these naval institutions has been to date more than $160,000,000, while for the past half decade the yearly maintainence of these plants has involved an annual drain of more than twelve million dollars upon Uncle Sam's pocketbook.

The worst of it is that some of our navy yards now in existence actually have not sufficient water leading to them to allow modern vessels to approach and lie at the docks. The explanation of this queer state of affairs is to be found in the conditions during the early history of the republic when our coast defenses were of a minor character and it was thought best to place the navy yards some distance back from the coast for the sake of protection. The vessels of the old navy were of light draft so that location did not much matter, but this does not help matters today when the navy men have to take into account battleships of 27,000 tons instead of sloops of 1,500 tons such as the famous old Kearsarge.

In the old days when the war craft were dependent upon sails for motive power and distances were not so easily traversed as at present it was considered necessary to have places for the repair of naval vessels at frequent intervals along the coast. This explains, in a measure, how it happens that we find on the Atlantic coast some ten naval institutions, whereas the Pacific coast has but two such randezvous. However, even on the west coast the situation does not entirely satisfy the naval experts. The navy yard on Puget Sound is pronounced pretty satisfactory in almost all respects, but the one on Mare Island, near San Francisco, is objected to because there is an inadequate depth of water to accommodate our heaviest warships. Of course the people at the Golden Gate will not hear of the removal of their naval station, and, indeed the naval officials do not want to abandon this locality altogether, consequently, as the only alternative, congress will be appealed to for money to build a new and up-to-date navy yard on some new site on San Francisco Bay.

Easily the most radical of all the proposals having to do with navy yard consolidation and the one that has resulted in the greatest storm of protest from the cities to be left out in the cold is the suggestion that the navy department abandon the navy yards at New York, at Boston and at Portsmouth, N. H. (in reality Kittery Point, Maine) and handle all the work now entrusted to these three yards at a new and thoroughly up-to-date navy yard to be established at some point on Narragansett Bay. Congress can scarcely be expected to sanction such a radical move in a hurry, although it may permit some of the other details of the main scheme to be carried out because of the plea for greater economy in running the government.

If the big station were established on Narragansett Bay it would become the chief rendezvous for all our warships in the North Atlantic, whereas the common objective point in the more southernly seas would be the new naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, which is now declared to be the key to the defense of our entire Southern Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast and the Panama Canal,—which latter will have to be taken into account in all future calculations relative to our naval doings. Guantanamo Bay offers deep water for accommodating at anchor a fleet of thirty-five battleships and is ideal in almost every respect and it will be strange if this island outpost does not become in time the chief naval base of Uncle Sam on the Atlantic just as Pearl Harbor will on the Pacific.

Dry docks complicate the situation with reference to abandoning existing navy yards. A navy yard without a dock capable of accommodating such warships as need repairs to the underwater portions would be at a most serious disadvantage. Thus while undoubtedly the repair and manufacturing work required for the navy could best be done in fewer yards the fact remains that Uncle Sam has a lot of money tied up in docks and repair facilities and the navy department cannot arbitrarily abandon yards with dry docks capable of receiving battleships.

MARRIED IN WHITE MAN'S WAY

John Lodgepole and Mary Steep Hill, full-blooded Indians, came over from the Crow reservation last week to get married in the white man's way, says a dispatch from Sheridan, Wyo. They brought with them numerous relatives, and when the Rev. Mr. Carney of the white church called them before him to perform the ceremony there were enough Indians around the court house to start a wild west show. But a marriage in the white man's way by the white man's preacher is not an everyday occurrence on the Indian reservations, and when one does take place every Indian within 40 miles comes, if he can possibly do so. So, when it becomes noised or was announced over the Crow reservation that Lodgepole was to marry Mary Steep Hill, daughter of Short Boy and Buffalo Robe, every "buck" who got wind of the coming event came over to Sheridan to see how it was done.

The bride was only 17 years old, while the bridegroom was 22. She was dressed in a gown of bright-colored calico, with a gorgeous blanket over her shoulders, and she came as near to looking pretty as is possible for a Crow girl. Dodgepola was dressed to "kill." He wore a cowboy costume and around his waist was a sash of so many colors that Joseph's famous coat would have looked like a piece of burlap beside it. A metal badge, nearly as large as a saucer, was suspended around his neck by a buckskin thong. Every move showed the white spectators that he thought he was conferring a great favor on the Indian maid by giving her his name.

After the ceremony the bridal party started off down the street. John, the bridegroom, and his new father-in-law in front. Then came the mother-in-law with a papoose on her back, and along behind came the bride, walking by herself. Presently John halted and motioned to his bride. As she approached, he threw a package he had been carrying into her arms. "Ugh!" he said. "Squaw carry." Then he stalked off down the street. The honeymoon was over.

But John will treat Mary according to the old Indian law or he will lose her. She is married according to the white man's way, but that will not prevent the squaw from leaving his tent and returning to that of her mother if she feels inclined to do so, and nothing John can say or do will have the least effect in forcing her to return to him. For a number of years the government has done all in its power to force the Indians to marry in the white men's way and to remain married after the ceremony, but very little progress has been made. Once in a great while there will be an Indian wedding performed after the white way, but a large majority of them take place under the old Indian customs.

The Indian word for marriage is the equivalant of "she followed him," and that phrase tells the whole story. Literally, when an Indian girl marries a "buck" she simply walks out of her mother's tepee and into that of her future lord. And likewise, when she wants a divorce she takes the back trail and returns to her mother. The Indian law will not permit the deserted husband to interfere with her in any way, once she leaves his tent. She is then free to "marry" any other Indian she may wish to. Where a divorce is so easily obtainable the marriage vows are not regarded very highly. In fact, there are no marriage vows whatever in the Indian ceremony.

The parents of the bride and bridegroom do most of the "courting," and, contrary to the general belief that the girls are sold to their husbands, this is rarely done. The older ones make all arrangements and then the young "buck" calls on the girl. They sit in the tepee with the other members of the family, but so close together that the old squaw throws a blanket over them, hiding them from sight of the others in the tent. Finally matters are arranged to suit, and the young man, for four consecutive nights, serenades his inamorata, the serenade consisting of music made on a kind of flute. On the fourth night, however, instead of turning away after playing his tune, he boldly enters the girl's tepee and sits down. After a few minutes' wait he gets up and walks out. The girl follows him. He goes to the tent or cabin which he has previously prepared and enters. A moment later the girl enters, lays aside her blanket and starts cooking dinner. The marriage is over.

The bridegroom, before the courtship, has made a "present" to the girl's father. Sometimes it is a bunch of cattle or horses, or whatever may be agreed upon. The older men holds this present for several months and if the young people are getting along together nicely, he then gives it all back to them as a kind of dowry. If, however, they have trouble, and there is a "divorce," he keeps the gift and later gives it to the girl. And the mother-in-law is supreme. The girl's mother can, at any time she chooses, go over to the young people's tent, take her daughter by the hand and lead her home. The husband can say nothing whatever to an action of that kind, and for that reason, he cultivates the good opinion of his mother-in-law more than he does that of his squaw.

That is the kind of marriage relation the government has been trying to discontinue, and all efforts have been made to persuade the Indians to be married according to the white man's ways, but with so little result that a marriage a la "white man" is a rarity that attracts the attention of both the whites and the Indians.

WANTED.

"I should think," said the woman of the house, "you would have too much self-respect to make your living by begging."

"Lady," protested Ruffon Wrats, straightening himself up, "self-respeck is wot ails me! I wouldn't do this fur no other man on earth."

DOESN'T FEAR ZERO WEATHER

Girl With Cot and Waterproof Blanket Spends Her Nights in Open Air During All Seasons.

Chicago.—For the first time in two years Harrie Downs, 12 years old, spent the other night in a conventional atmosphere of steam radiators and wall paper. It was not because it was cold. Harrie slept outdoors every night during Chicago's seventy-three-hours' stretch of below-zero weather. The trouble was that she got home a little late from a party and the effort of making her bed outside didn't seem worth while.

Harrie Downs.

Harrie is the daughter of E. E. Downs of Evanston, general manager of the Elgin and Belvidere Electric Railway company. Two years ago she was bothered with adenoids. A specialist advised that Herrie sleep outside, winter and summer. Mr. Downs purchased a cot, a waterproof blanket, and a porch screen. He hung the screen on a porch of the Downs apartment, a block from Lake Michigan.

"It'll be nice tonight," commented Harrie, surveying the snow-laid floor. "I always like it when it snows. Last night I didn't get any sleep at all. I had both windows open, but the room still seemed hot."

Harrie says she intends to continue sleeping outside all her life.

CHILD IS BURIED ALIVE

Father Admits Brutal Murder in California Court—Wife Is Charged Jointly for Crime.

San Francisco, Cal.—Charged with murdering his infant son, John Rech, an Italian, was before the Superior court of California, recently. Rech was a willing witness and told the court that he and his wife had talked about "putting away" their child thousands of times that they might have more money to send to the old folks in Italy.

In his statement Rech declared he took the baby back of the barn at his home, where he had dug a hole and, placing the baby in a sitting posture, filled the hole with earth. The death wounds found on the babe's head were inflicted, Rech said, by his shovel when he tamped down the dirt.

The proceedings in court were not lengthy. After Rech's statement had been made it was read over to him by the interpreter and he readily signed it. As he affixed his name to the document, which the authorities declare is virtually his death warrant, Rech showed the first sign of emotion since his arrest. Large tears trickled down his cheeks and he sat silently for a few moments holding his head in his hands.

HEN REMAINED AT HER POST

Was Sitting on Nest in Separator and Stuck While Machine Threshed Out Field of Wheat.

Sioux Falls, S. D.—A threshing machine taken out of a shed for the first time this season was used to thresh out a small field of wheat, near this city. When the job was finished, the machine man discovered a hen sitting on a nest of eggs in a corner of the separator. The wind from the fan ruffled her feathers, the whirling of the pulleys had evidently annoyed her somewhat, and there was dust in her mouth, and fright in her eye, but like the immortal boy on the burning deck, she stuck to her post. Of the thirteen eggs in the nest, only one was injured.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Vanity Class Is Feature In School

CAN YOU TELL WHAT IS VERY BAD ABOUT THIS DRESS?

NEW YORK.—A vanity class, it was revealed recently, has been started among the girls in Erasmus Hall High school, Brooklyn, as a part of the hygiene and gymnasium courses. It was originated by Catherine Turner, assistant principal, as a means of teaching the girls to take greater pride in their personal appearance.

Miss Turner, who is active in evolving the new course, is a stanch believer in simple gowns. She insists that girls may be just as attractive in simple frocks as in silks, provided they pay attention to many other things and make it a point to appear neat. To the girls she has made it a point to explain the many things that are required to look fetching. She has given lectures on the care of the person, on harmony in dress, taste in the selection of materials, and on many other things.

The opportunity for giving more attention to those things has come because of the inability of all the classes to get as many hours, as set in the schedule, in the gymnasium every week. As the exercises are intended primarily to aid girls in improving their appearance, it was decided to devote an hour to the vanity class. The girls are gathered in the auditorium. Five of the most attractive girls are selected and sent on the stage in the full glare of the footlights.

Aid is given to the observation powers of the girls by the teachers, who call attention to various parts of the girls' dress. After that has been done the pupils are required to vote on the appearance of the girls. The main points considered are the figure, teeth, hair and feet. Different girls are inspected every week.

Wireless Used by Cupid On Steamer

LOVE
LOVE
LOVE
LOVE WILL ALWAYS FIND A WAY

SAN FRANCISCO.—A prank of Cupid with the wireless aboard the Pacific Mail liner Mongolia the other day basely betrayed to an indulgent world afloat and ashore the plan of Lieut. Edmund Spence Root of the navy to marry Miss Maude May Radcliffe, daughter of E. F. Radcliffe, electrical manufacturer of Portland, Ore., and to surprise his relatives and friends with the news.

The Mongolia was plowing serenely toward San Francisco when the god of love began to get busy with the key of the wireless apparatus. Other vessels far at sea and a few of the land stations received the persistent call of the Mongolia's operator, but the receiving stations did not pay much attention until the words "marriage license" clicked forth in the dispatch leaving the Mongolia's aerials.

The aerogram was addressed to Miss Radcliffe at the Palace hotel, and after a few phrases, important only to the parties directly involved, explained that the liner would not arrive until late, and that unless a license were procured Saturday a wedding could not take place in San Francisco.

The lieutenant was hurrying home from the Asiatic station, under orders to report at once to Washington, so Miss Radcliffe used the more discreet and secretive telephone to beg Grant Munson, marriage license clerk, to hold the office open until the Mongolia arrived. The gallant Munson did even better—he promised to return to his office and issue the license at any time she and her fiance should appear.

At 7:30 o'clock the officer and the girl were at the official trysting place and soon were in possession of the coveted permit. The lieutenant gave his address as Cincinnati, O., but explained that the residence was purely theoretical, he having a sister living in that city. Miss Radcliffe gave her address as Portland, Ore., where the navy man first courted her.

Lieutenant Root soon located a minister who tied the knot.

Farmer Boy Buncos City Firemen

WILL YE HAVE JERSEY EGGS ER PLYMOUTH ROCK?—MY MAW HAS BOTH

CHICAGO.—Whether Frank Anderson came from Wheeler, Ind., or whether he didn't, he succeeded in working a "skin game" on scores of members of the city fire department that would do credit to the most experienced and skillful of Chicago confidence men, and now the firemen are looking up Wheeler, Ind., on the map. To their relief they find that Wheeler, Ind., is really so. This is the only thing they have found to be true about Frank Anderson, however.

Frank is a stolid, healthy-looking country lad, with rosy cheeks. He went around to the various fire houses and told his story.

"I live back on a farm near Wheeler, Ind.," he would say, "where my ma has 3,000 chickens and 19 cows. We got a toi'able sized farm back there. I came to Chicago to find my Aunt Jane, but run out o' finances and I calculate as how I'll have to hoof it back. If one of you gentlemen will assist me in getting back home I'll send you more than I borrowed in eggs and butter."

Jerome Connor, a salesman, who happened to be in the quarters of engine company No. 5, 326 South Jefferson street, listened and saw visions of omelettes. He bought $2 worth of eggs. Members of the engine company brought the donation up to $10, and Frank took the names of all.

As he was leaving one engine house after having made an extremely successful plea, he asked one of the men whether he preferred "Plymouth Rock" eggs or the "Jersey" kind. The eggs have not yet arrived.

Zoo Keeper Says Lions Are Alienists

NEW YORK.—"Bill" Snyder, head keeper at the Central Park menagerie, has qualified as an alienist.

"Bill" never graduated from a college, or served on an asylum's staff, but when a man named Fulberg tried to break into the lion cage, Snyder said at once he was crazy. How did he know? Because "Bill" says the lions always try to make friends with an insane person.

"Yep, I've never seen it fail yet," said "Bill." "Whenever a crazy man gets near a lion, the animal just naturally comes up close to the bars and tries to be a good fellow. He will wag his tail and purr like a cat. It's wonderful, but it's so. Why, I once knew a crazy man to take a lion's food away from the brute, and the animal seemed to be trying to smile about the joke."

"What do you suppose makes a lion so friendly with a crazy man?" "Bill" was asked.

"I never tried to figure it out, but I imagine it's because when a man goes crazy his animal nature comes out, and the lion recognizes itself in a little higher development.

"I wish I could be put on some lunacy commission. I would bring the subject down here, take him up to the lion cage and mighty soon find out if he is sane or not. It would save the state and city a whole lot of money, as they wouldn't have to hold a suspect under observation more than long enough to bring him to me."

"Is the lion the only animal that tries to become acquainted with lunatics?" "Bill" was asked.

"No, they all do in some way or another. For instance, the monkey makes an effort to search for fleas and the elephant tries to give the person a ride," [illegible]

PROMINENT PEOPLE

PRESIDENT SUN IS A HAWIIAN

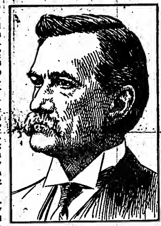
Probably nowhere was there greater surprise felt over the election of Dr. Sun Yet Sen as the president of the provincial republic of China than in Hawaii, where Dr. Sun was born. So true is it that a prophet is not without honor save in his own land. All during the years that Dr. Sun has been arousing his countrymen to longings for a newer and freer national life and organizing for it the people of Hawaii have looked on him as a professional adventurer, careful of his own safety while exploiting the rising patriotism of his compatriots.

From time to time for years past have come reports of uprisings in China, some of them of formidable promise, said to be the result of his propaganda. Each report of the kind has brought out in some of the Honolulu papers sarcastic or satirical paragraphs, describing him as a long-range revolutionist and a patriot for revenue.

Dr. Sun was born in the district of Kula, on the island of Maui, in the Hawaiian group. His father was one of the early Chinese immigrants to Hawaii, coming in the early sixties of the last century.

Sun was sent by his mother to Honolulu to be educated, going to Iolani college several years and ultimately embraced Christianity.

COLLEGE HEAD THREE DECADES



With no particular celebration to mark the event, the Rev. James D. Moffat, D. D., LL. D., recently entered upon the thirty-fourth year of his presidency of Washington and Jefferson college, a record for length of service and accomplishment which is equaled by few if any of the college and university presidents of the United States. A man widely known for his learning and for his business ability, a former moderator of the Presbyterian church and recognized as one of the most prominent divines of the Presbyterian denomination, Dr. Moffat has ably kept up the standing of the famous old school here which in its more than a century of history has gained a wide reputation as a classical institution of the highest order.

Dr. Moffat was born in New Lisbon, Ohio. After finishing his preparatory schooling he entered Washington and Jefferson, graduating with the class of 1869. In 1873 he was ordained a minister in the Presbyterian church of Wheeling, W. Va. In January, 1882, he became president of Washington and Jefferson.

BRIDE'S MANY REGAL GIFTS

Four million dollars in stocks, bonds and other securities was given to Mrs. Oliver Cromwell the other day by Edward T. Stotesbury, head of Drexel & Co., bankers, as a prelude to their marriage in the afternoon.

Besides the securities, Mr. Stotesbury gave his bride jewels valued at a million dollars.

The ceremony was performed at four o'clock at the home of the bride, 1808 New Hampshire avenue, Washington, D. C. The bishop of Washington, Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, read the service in the presence of a small but distinguished company, which included the president of the United States and Mrs. Taft, Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan and J. P. Morgan, Jr. Arthur Emlen Newbold of Philadelphia acted as best man. Mrs. Cromwell was given in marriage by her elder son, Oliver Eaton Cromwell, acting in the place of her father, James H. Roberts, who is ill in Florida.

The splendor of the bridal gifts amazed Washington society. Chief among the jewels presented by the groom is a long string of pearls, the most beautiful collection which Washington society has been permitted to view, purchased from a Parisian jeweler at a cost of half a million dollars.

U. S. AMBASSADOR RESIGNS

Robert Bacon, ambassador of the United States at Paris, has resigned to ally himself with Harvard university.

Ambassador Bacon's letter, in which he announced his resignation to President Taft, was received by the President at Washington a few days ago.

Mr. Bacon especially refrained from making his retirement public, as he desired the first announcement to come from Harvard university, which recently chose him to be a fellow in place of Judge Lowell, deceased.

Ambassador Bacon said he wished his friends to know that there were no ulterior motives for his resignation. He had been for 17 years a member of the board of overseers and could not, he said, decline the honor of becoming a fellow of Harvard, which he considered to be the best single influence for good in America.

Mr. Bacon added that he welcomed the opportunity to identify himself [illegible] tively with the great problems of American civic and national life.

"Is your resignation at this time influenced by the presidential election?" [illegible]

Discover Error On Cannon Trophy

ST JOHNS 1775
SURRENDERED AT YORKTOWN 1775
LOOKS KINDA MIXED UP TO ME ?-81-? NO SIR—

WASHINGTON.—Like a jaunty little watchdog at the right of the God of War there stands at one of the entrances to the war department a trim little cannon. It is a pigmy among the giant trophies of mighty guns that surround the building, but it has some history of its own.

It was the first cannon captured by the Americans from the British in the Revolutionary war, though it has not been so officially placed upon the records. It was captured by the great patriot-traitor general, Benedict Arnold.

It has, in a dozen years been passed by more army and navy officers and other notables of high mark and distinction than any gun in the United States. Yet in all this time that little gun has borne a marked error of history that it flaunted boldly on a large name plate—an error so plain that it should have been detected immediately by any passing high school cadet.

The gun is a bronze six-pounder, built in Holland in 1747 for King George of England.

Deeply cut along the barrel near the muzzle end is the following: "Surrendered by the Capitulation of St. Johns, 1775." But on a large metal plate sunk in the national shield, on which the gun is mounted, is this conflicting statement: "Revolutionary Trophy; Surrendered at Yorktown, 1775."

Thus the little gun appears to have been captured twice.

Capt. U. S. Grant, third superintendent of the building, has corrected the error at last.

"Beyond doubt," said Captain Grant, "the gun was captured on some of the adventurous expeditions made by the early revolutionists in 1775."

"Grizzly" Danced By Capital Society

WE'VE COME TO STAY!

IN SPITE of the intensely cold winter weather the social season in Washington was at its height New Year's week, which was an exceptionally gay one, beginning and ending with a dance, the Charity ball Monday and the second hop of the season at the navy yard.

Among the many other important functions of the week were the diplomatic reception at the White House on Tuesday night, which went down in the social annals of the national capital as one of the most resplendent ever held there.

Mrs. Hugh Roland French created something of a sensation that evening in the first "harem skirt" to appear at a social function in Washington.

It seems the new-style dances of the season, the "Turkey Trot," the "Grizzly Bear" and the like have come to stay in Washington, despite the ban which has been placed upon them by some of the more conservative. After the dances at the Barracks and Fort Myer a week or so ago, some of the mothers of debutantes of this year and last, banded themselves together for the purpose of eliminating these dances from the program of any balls which their daughters were to attend in the future, but so far their campaign has apparently been of no avail. Certainly the "Grizzly," the "Turkey" and the "Spanish Boston" were much in evidence this week. The debutante who can boast these accomplishments, has no lack of partners.

The president and Mrs. Taft occupied the box set aside for them at the ball Monday evening for more than an hour.

New Ptarmigan Species Discovered

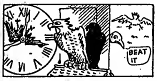
WHILE on an expedition for the Smithsonian Institution in the Aleutian islands for the purpose of gathering material for the continuation of the "Life History of North American Birds," A. C. Bent discovered a subspecies of ptarmigan, to be known as the Tanega ptarmigan. The ptarmigan belong to the same general group with the domestic fowl. They are circumpolar in distribution, but are found principally in North American, and are represented by some 15 known species and subspecies.

A striking seasonal change of plumage which is perhaps more pronounced than that exhibited by any other birds, takes place among the ptarmigan. In most species there are three, or even four, complete changes of plumage; that of winter being chiefly pure white, while in other seasons it varies to brown, buff, gray or black. Living as these birds do in the arctic regions and in rugged snow-capped mountains, the changes in plumage affords efficient protection from their many enemies, since they harmonize in color with their surroundings.

The new subspecies, described by Mr. Bent, was found on Tanega island, one of the Aleutian chain, Alaska, and takes its common name from that place, although scientifically it is named after Dr. Leonard C. Sanford, and will be known as lagopus sanfordi. Ptarmigan were particularly tame and abundant on Tanega island, and good series of the birds and nests were collected for the National museum. As the collecting was done in June, most of the specimens secured were in summer plumage.

The pamphlet (publication No. 2,066 of the Smithsonian miscellaneous collections) describing this bird is quite technical.

Greedy Hawk Damages Big Clock



THE hawk whose frequent excursions from his aerie in Smithsonian park to the relay station for carrier pigeons in the postoffice tower have furnished him prey and food in the winter season of scarcity, has tried to stop the post office clock.

Perhaps finding that the hour of his depredations was established, and the clock watched by his anticipated victims, so that they might evade his sudden swooping down upon them, he has thrown the plucked corpse of a pigeon which had satisfied his appetite into the back of the dial of the timepiece.

Had the body lodged between the hands, the perfectly balanced mechanism must have stopped. The body appears to have stuck on the pin in the very center of the dial, which holds the hands in place and operates their movement round the face of the clock.

To remove the corpse from the clock offers a big difficulty to the keepers of the building. It will probably be necessary to remove one of the glass panels in the clock dial, to get at the intruding substance, unless the movement of the hands finally dislodges it. This explains the antics of the clock recently.

Severe cold and the depredations of the hawk have brought death to many pigeons who have sought shelter in the high tower.

Winging their flight for the refuge promised by the tower in a half frozen condition, it is probable that the pigeons struck their heads against the stone upright of the tower, were stunned by the impact and fell helpless to the roof below.

THE CAT.

From the standpoint of utility, except in so far as decorativeness is utility, not much can be said for the average cat these days. The cat enjoys its privileges without greatly concerning itself with the responsibilities. And in point of fact, its services in most houses would be superfluous. The mousetrap now does for most households what the cat formerly did. Nor is the cat particularly distinguished by the affection for its master which is so conspicuous in the dog, its sole domestic rival for the warm spot under the kitchen stove. If you will note the cat carefully, you will observe that it usually wants something of you when it comes around. None of its calls are courtesy calls. The arched back and the "mew-mew" are eloquent of its desires. If it does not receive these marks of attention and fails to find anything else that interests it, say, a nice warm spot in your lap to take a doze on, the cat moves majestically and indifferently away. Your personality has no particular charm for it. It admires the radiator more than it does you. These characteristic symptoms of self-centeredness and grave detachment are reinforced by the eyes of the cat. A cat's eyes look at you, but they seem to be looking beyond you. They are like the eyes of the caged lion, which always seem to be seeing the distant desert that it loves and that is calling to it by night and day.

From year to year there have come reports of the increase of deer in Connecticut which western people have found it difficult to believe. Last year there were complaints that the protected animals were destroying farmers' crops. This year comes the story that the Connecticut game wardens have given warning that motormen on interurban electric cars must exercise the utmost care not to run down deer which happen to get upon the track, or they will be made to incur the full penalty of the law for killing deer out of season. It is said that a considerable number of deer have been killed in this way, especially at night, when they were attracted by the headlights. Deer stalking with an electric car is certainly a modern method of acquiring venison; but they were always an ingenious folk in the state of the wooden nutmeg.

A bonfire was held by the Postoffice Department of over 170,000 Christmas postal cards, barred because of their tinsel decoration, notification having been made that these cards are unmailable on account of danger to the clerks in handling. The number sent in spite of the warning shows that men and women are but children of a larger growth, who keep on doing things apparently because they have been told not to do them.

Census returns of the foreign-born inhabitants of Greater New York show that there are more natives of Italy residing in the Empire City than there are in Palermo. In a similar way the Russian-born population of New York far exceeds the entire number of inhabitants of so characteristically a Russian city as Kiev. The Russian-born New Yorkers number almost half a million and the Italian-born New Yorkers exceed 340,000.

The patient Griselda's famous record for meekness and endurance has been beaten by a woman in Chicago. For twelve years she supported her husband with patient resignation, but finally decided that having to take beatings as well as give earnings was a little too much, even for a modern Griselda.

URGES NEEDS OF PUBLIC DOMAIN

Immediate Legislation Is Imperative, Says the President.

ASKS NEW LAWS FOR ALASKA

Rules Governing Acquisition of Arid or Semi-Arid Lands Should Be Modified—Commission on Cost of Living.

Washington, Feb. 2.—A special message on the work of the Interior department and other matters was read to Congress today.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

There is no branch of the Federal jurisdiction which calls more imperatively for immediate legislation than that which concerns the public domain, and especially the part of that domain which is in Alaska.

The progress under the reclamation act has made clear the defects of its limitations, which should be remedied. The rules governing the acquisition of homesteads, of land that is not arid or semi-arid, are not well adapted to the perfecting of title to land made arable by government reclamation work.

I concur with the Secretary of the Interior in his recommendation that, after entry is made upon land being reclaimed, actual occupation as a homestead of the same be not required until two years after entry, but that cultivation of the same shall be required, and that the present provision under which the land is to be paid for in ten annual installments shall be so modified as to allow a patent issue for the land at the end of five years' cultivation and three years' occupation, with a reservation of a government lien for the amount of the unpaid purchase money. This leniency to the reclamation homesteader will relieve him from occupation at a time when the condition of the land makes it most burdensome and difficult, and at the end of five years will furnish him with a title upon which he can borrow money and continue the improvement of his holding.

I also concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior that all of our public domain should be classified and that each class should be disposed of or administered in the manner most appropriate to that particular class.

Leasing of Government Lands.

The chief change, however, which ought to be made, and which I have already recommended in previous messages and communications to congress, is that by which government coal land and phosphate and other mineral lands containing non-metalliferous minerals, shall be leased by the government, with restrictions as to size and time, resembling those which now obtain throughout the country between the owners in fee and the lessees who work the mines, and in leases like those which have been most successful in Australia, New Zealand, and Nova Scotia. The showing made by investigations into the successful working of the leasing system leaves no doubt as to its wisdom and practical utility. Requirements as to the working of the mine during the term may be so framed as to prevent any holding of large mining properties merely for speculation, while the royalties may be made sufficiently low, not unduly to increase the cost of the coal mined, and at the same time sufficient to furnish a reasonable income for the use of the public in the community where the mining goes on. In Alaska, there is no reason why a substantial income should not thus be raised for such public works as may be deemed necessary or useful.

Would Build Trunk Line Railroad.

I am not in favor of government ownership where the same certainty and efficiency of service can be had by private enterprise, but I think the conditions presented in Alaska are of such a character as to warrant the government, for the purpose of encouraging the development of that vast and remarkable territory, to build and own a trunk line railroad, which it can lease on terms which may be varied and changed to meet the growing prosperity and development of the territory.

I have already recommended to Congress the establishment of a form of commission government for Alaska. The territory is too extended, its needs are too varied, and its distance from Washington too remote to enable Congress to keep up with its necessities in the matter of legislation of a local character.

The governor of Alaska in his report points out certain laws that ought to be adopted, and emphasizes what I have said as to the immediate need for a government of much wider powers than now exists there, if it can be said to have any government at all.

Lower Colorado River.

There is transmitted herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Interior setting out the work done under joint resolution approved June 25, 1910, authorizing the expenditure of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary, to be expended by the President for the purpose of protecting lands and property in the Imperial valley and elsewhere along the Colorado river in Arizona. The money was expended and the protective works erected, but the disturbances in Mexico so delayed the work, and the floods in the Colorado river were so extensive that a part of the works have been carried away, and the need for further action and expenditure of money exists.

Water-Power Sites.

In previous communications to Congress I have pointed out two methods by which the water-power sites on non-navigable streams may be controlled as between the state and the national government. It has seemed wise that the control should be concentrated in one government or the other as the active participant in supervising its use by private enterprise.

The Secretary of the Interior has suggested another method by which the water-power site shall be leased directly by the government to those who exercise a public franchise under provisions imposing a rental for the water power to create a fund to be expended by the general government for the improvement of the stream and the benefit of the local community where the power site is, and permitting the state to regulate the rates at which the converted power is sold. The latter method suggested by the Secretary is a more direct method for Federal control, and in view of the probable union and systematic organization and welding together of the power derived from water within a radius of 300 or 400 miles, I think it better that the power of control should remain in the national government than that it should be turned over to the states. Under such a system the Federal government would have such direct supervision of the whole matter that any honest administration could easily prevent the abuses which a monopoly of absolute ownership in private persons or companies would make possible.

For some years past the high and steadily increasing cost of living has been a matter of such grave public concern that I deem it of great public interest that an international conference be proposed at this time for the purpose of preparing plans, to be submitted to the various governments, for an international inquiry into the high cost of living, its extent, causes, effects, and possible remedies. I therefore recommend that, to enable the president to invite foreign governments to such a conference, to be held at Washington or elsewhere, the congress provide an appropriation, not to exceed $20,000, to defray the expenses of preparation and of participation by the United States.

Commission on Industrial Relations.

The extraordinary growth of industry in the past two decades and its revolutionary changes have raised new and vital questions as to the relations between employers and wage earners which have become matters of pressing public concern. Industrial relations concern the public for a double reason. We are directly interested in the maintenance of peaceful and stable industrial conditions for the sake of our own comfort and well-being; but society is equally interested, in its effectively civic capacity, in seeing that our institutions are effectively maintaining justice and fair dealing between any classes of citizens whose economic interests may seem to clash.

The magnitude and complexity of modern industrial disputes have put upon some of our statutes and our present mechanism for adjusting such differences—where we can be said to have any mechanism at all—a strain they were never intended to bear and for which they are unsuited.. What is urgently needed to day is a re-exami-

Misbranding Imported Goods.

My attention has been called to the injustice which is done in this country by the sale of articles in the trade purporting to be made in Ireland, when they are not so made, and it is suggested that the justice of the enactment of a law which, so far as the jurisdiction of the federal government can go, would prevent a continuance of this misrepresentation to the public and fraud upon those who are entitled to use the statement in the sale of their goods. I think it to be greatly in the interest of fair dealing, which ought always to be encouraged by law, for congress to enact a law making it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, to use the mails or to put into interstate commerce any articles of merchandise which bear upon their face a statement that they have been manufactured in some particular country when the fact is otherwise.

Delicate Criticism.

A woman well known in New York for her exquisite taste as well as knowledge of the decorative and architectural history of the world called on the wife of a multi-millionaire who had recently built and furnished a Fifth avenue mansion at great cost.

"This," said the hostess proudly, as she threw open a heavy door, "is my Louis Quatorze room." The visitor gazed about her for a moment and then made answer: "What makes you think so?"

Saved.

"Dearest," she asked, taking advantage of the fact that it was leap year, "will you be mine?"

For a moment the young man feared that he was up against it. Then, struck by a happy thought, he replied: "You will have to ask mother."

Reply in Kind.

"If you had a leap year proposal from a pretty girl, what would you do?"

"I'd jump at it."

LOS ANGELES PROSECUTOR PREDICTS STARTLING DEVELOPMENTS IN M'NAMARA CASE.

WILL PRESS DARROW'S TRIAL

District Attorney's Assistants Are Bent on Securing Chicago Lawyer's Conviction on Bribery Charge, But Admit There Will Be Delay.

Los Angeles, Cal.—Although acting with all celerity, the prosecution in the case of Clarence S. Darrow, former chief counsel of the McNamaras, who is accused of jury bribery, does not expect to bring the noted lawyer to trial on the two indictments against him for a long time.

Meanwhile the county grand jury which reported the bills against Darrow will continue to probe, and W. Joseph Ford, the deputy district attorney who conducted the bribery investigation, declared that startling developments, wholly apart from Darrow and concerning only the conspiracy phase of the alleged national dynamiting operations of John J. McNamara and his "wrecking crew," might be expected at any time.

While extending to Darrow every personal courtesy, the assistants of District Attorney John F. Fredericks, his victorious adversary in the famous dynamite trial, are bent on procuring his conviction. The charges that he bribed Robert Bain, a sworn juror, and George N. Lockwood, a venireman, will be pressed, although the actual passing of the money, it is alleged, was intrusted to Detective Bert Franklin, who is scheduled to be tried on similar charges February 27.

Governor Foss Orders 12 Companies of Infantry and Two Troops of Cavalry to Lawrence.

Lawrence, Mass.—One woman shot dead, a policeman probably fatally stabbed, scores of alleged strikebreakers dragged from street cars going in the direction of the woolen mills and beaten, several strikers battered by policemen's clubs, trolley lines tied up and several cars partially wrecked, these are the net results of the worst day of rioting since the beginning of the strike of woolen mill workers. Governor Foss, at the appeal of Mayor Scanlon, ordered 12 companies of infantry and two troops of cavalry to hasten here to reinforce the five companies of infantry now on duty.

GREAT EVENT FOR NEW YORK

Digging of Remarkable Water System Tunnel Under the Hudson River Is Completed.

New York.—The forging of the greatest link in the greatest chain of its kind in the world's history was completed when a blast of dynamite, fired 1,100 feet under the surface of the Hudson river at Storm King, N. Y., concluded the digging of a tunnel through which in years to come will pour millions of gallons of water from the Catskill mountains for consumption by the city of New York, more than a hundred miles distant.

NEW EDICT IS SIGNED

MANCHU RULERS DECIDE TO ABDICATE THRONE.

Chinese Flock to Legations in Fear of Massacre by Fanatical Foes.

Tientsin.—An abdication edict has been signed by the Manchu rulers who are besieged in their palace at Peking and for the present have no means of escape.

The troops of the Manchu garrison have sworn vengeance on the empress dowager and the princes for their act and have declared they will shoot them on sight. Every precaution is being taken to guard against treachery within the palace.

The abdication has precipitated chaotic conditions here. The officials are in a panic, the mayor has resigned and fled with his family to the French concession. Martial law has been proclaimed in the native city.

The edict grants the request of Yuan Shi Kai that the bestowal of a marquisate upon him, which the throne has proposed, be deferred until after peace has been restored.

This request of the premier is taken to indicate that he has transferred his allegiance to the republicans, but will remain in Peking to prevent a Manchu outbreak.

The republican army is disregarding the extension of the armistice, having resumed hostilities.

Private dispatches describe the situation in Peking as bordering on an uprising. Hundreds of Chinese are flocking to the foreign legations for protection and the wealthy residents are storing their treasures within the foreign concessions.

LETTER AS PERJURY PROOF

Note Ascribed to Canadian Says He Made Hines "Come Across" After Exposure Threats.

Washington.—Evidence intended to show that Charles McGowan, a young Canadian who testified in defense of C. F. Wiehe before the Lorimer investigation committee of the senate last summer, perjured himself was offered before the committee by William J. Burns, the detective who gained fame in the McNamara case.

Repeated verbal clashes between Mr. Burns and Elbridge Hanecy, attorney for Senator Lorimer, marked the hearing.

The most important evidence presented by Mr. Burns consisted of a letter written by McGowan to A. C. Bailey, one of the Burns operatives, in which McGowan said in reference to his testimony:

"I made them come across at that; not all I expected, though, and I had a — of a time getting it, too. Had to threaten him with all kinds of exposure."

According to a statement by Mr. Burns on the stand, the dictagraph records will include an admission by McGowan that he heard Mr. Wiehe, who is a brother-in-law of Edward Hines, tell William Burgess of Duluth that he contributed $10,000 toward a $100,000 Lorimer slush fund.

At times during Mr. Burns' testimony it seemed altogether probable that the detective might undertake to attack Mr. Hanecy.

Time after time Mr. Burns made stinging replies to what he considered insulting questions by Mr. Hanecy.

EIGHT DIE IN RIOTS

CITIZENS FLEE FROM JUAREZ, MEX., AS MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT IS OVERTHROWN.

DRUNKEN TROOPS SEIZE CITY.

Scores Are Shot, Stores and Saloons Looted, Prisoners in Jail Liberated—Six Hundred Madero's Soldiers En Route to Quell Mutineers.

El Paso, Tex.—Juarez, Mex., just across the Rio Grande river, is practically deserted following the rioting led by mutinous, drunken troops, who seized the town, shot scores of citizens, looted many stores and saloons, and burned property valued at $275,000.

Eight persons are dead and many wounded. Anarchy and mob law prevail, as the municipal government has been overturned and the officials have fled for their lives.

More trouble seems inevitable, as 600 of Madero's soldiers are said to be on the way to quell the mutineers. When the troops will arrive is not known, as the railroad lines have been blocked by the rebels. The mutineers say they will fight any force sent against them.

The leaders met in the plaza and appointed administrative officers. Santiago Mestas was chosen provisional mayor.

Nearly all the residents of Juarez have fled to El Paso and many of the poorer families are camping in the open country on the American bank of the Rio Grande.

U. S. STEEL FILES ANSWER

Corporation Replies to Federal Suit Denying It Is a Monopoly and Justifies Its Course.

Trenton, N. J.—The United States Steel corporation filed its answer to the petition of the federal government in which the court was prayed to adjudge the steel company illegal and in restraint of trade.

The answer is a general denial to the allegations of the government, it defends the organization of the subsidiary companies, denies that they were formed in violation of the anti-trust act, asserts that they were a normal and necessary development of the times, and insists that instead of restraining trade or customers, they have developed and increased the same.

Messrs. Gary and Frick of the Steel corporation went to see the president of the United States on the fourth of November, 1907, and laid the situation before him.

It admits "that the president stated that he did not feel it to be his duty to prevent the proposed transaction," and says that "in reliance upon said statement Messrs. Gary and Frick returned to New York, whereupon the purchase was completed."

The answer denies "that the Tennessee company was a strong present or probable future competitor of the Steel corporation at the time of its acquisition by the latter."

The next move is for the government to file a replication, after which the United States court will appoint an examiner to take evidence.

EDWIN HAWLEY PASSES AWAY

Famous Railroad Magnate Dies Suddenly of Heart Disease at His New York Home.

New York.—Edwin Hawley, one of the foremost railroad men in the United States, member of the firm of Hawley & Davis, and known generally as the "successor of Harriman," died suddenly at his home here of heart disease.

While Mr. Hawley had not been well for the past six weeks, his condition had not aroused any serious apprehension and it was only Wednesday that he sent a message to his friends that "the report of my death is greatly exaggerated."

Mr. Hawley was a prominent figure in Wall street and was connected with scores of financial concerns, either as president or director. He was a prominent factor in more than a dozen railroads. Mr. Hawley was a bachelor. The body was taken to Chatham, N. Y., for burial.

Jay Gould Is Now Father.

New York.—Mr. and Mrs. Jay Gould are receiving congratulations on the birth of a daughter. Mrs. Jay Gould was Miss Annie Douglas Graham, a daughter of a former marriage of Mrs. Hubert Vos. Her marriage to Jay Gould, the second son of Mr. and Mrs. George J. Gould, took place at St. Thomas church last April.

Pass Borah's Child's Bill.

Washington.—The senate, after a four-hour debate, passed Senator Borah's bill creating a children's bureau in the department of commerce and labor. A similar bill is now pending in the house and there is no doubt it will pass.

German Squadron Comes.

Berlin.—A German squadron will be sent to American waters this year to return the visit to Kiel of the second division of the United States North Atlantic squadron last June.

JUST A LITTLE TOO HASTY

Mr. Newlywed Resented What He Considered Impertinence, but the Joke Was on Him.

They were on their wedding tour, and imagined that every civility given them related to their new condition of servitude.

Having stopped at a way station, the bridegroom was approached by the station agent, who asked:

"Are you going to take the next train?"

"It's none of your business," retorted the bridegroom, indignantly, as he guided the bride up the platform, where they condoled with each other over the impertinence of some of the natives.

Onward came the train, its vapor curling from afar. It was the last to their destination that day—an express. Nearer and nearer it came at full speed; then in a moment it whizzed past and was gone.

"Why in thunder didn't that train stop!" yelled the bridegroom.

"Cos you said 'twarn't none of my business. I has to signal if that train's to stop."

THE CARELESS GROCER

Blundered, and Great Good Came of It.

A careless grocer left the wrong package at a Michigan home one day and thereby brought a great blessing to the household.

"Two years ago I was a sufferer from stomach troubles, so acute that the effort to digest ordinary food gave me great pain, and brought on a condition of such extreme nervousness that I could not be left alone. I thought I should certainly become insane. I was so reduced in flesh that I was little better than a living skeleton. The doctors failed to give me relief and I despaired of recovery.

"One day our groceryman left a package of Grape-Nuts food by mistake, so I tried some for dinner. I was surprised to find that it satisfied my appetite and gave me no distress whatever. The next meal I ate of it again, and to be brief, I have lived for the past year almost exclusively on Grape-Nuts. It has proved to be a most healthful and appetizing food, perfectly adapted to the requirements of my system.

"Grape-Nuts is not only easily digested and assimilated, but I find that since I have been using it I am able to eat anything else my appetite fancies, without trouble from indigestion. The stomach trouble and nervousness have left me, I have regained my plumpness and my views of life are no longer despondent and gloomy.

"Other members of my family, especially my husband, (whose old enemy, the 'heart-burn,' has been vanquished) have also derived great benefit from the use of Grape-Nuts food and we think no morning meal complete without it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

It was a quiet night in the Tivoli. At the bar, which ranged along one side of the large chinked-log room, leaned half a dozen men, two of whom were discussing the relative merits of spruce tea and lime juice as remedies for scurvy. They argued with an air of depression and with intervals of morose silence. The other men scarcely heeded them. In a row, against the opposite wall, were the gambling games. The crap table was deserted. One lone man was playing at the faro table. The roulette was not even spinning, and the gamekeeper stood by the roaring, red-hot stove, talking with a young, dark-eyed woman, comely of face and figure, who was known from Juneau to Fort Yukon as the Virgin. Three men sat in at stud poker, but they played with small chips and without enthusiasm, while there were no onlookers. On the floor of the dancing room, which opened out at the rear, three couples were waltzing drearily to the strains of a violin and a piano.

Circle City was not deserted, nor was money tight. The miners were in from Moosehead creek and the other diggings to the west, the summer washing had been good, and the men's pouches were heavy with dust and nuggets. The Klondike had not yet been discovered, nor had the miners of the Yukon learned the possibilities of deep digging and wood-firing. No work was done in the winter, and they made a practice of hibernating in the large camps like Circle City during the long Arctic night. Time was heavy on their hands, their pouches were well filled and the only social diversion to be found was in the saloons. Yet the Tivoli was practically deserted, and the Virgin, standing by the stove, yawned with uncovered mouth and said to Charley Bates:

"If something don't happen soon, I'm goin' to bed. What's the matter with the camp, anyway? Everybody dead?"

Bates did not even trouble to reply, but went on moodily rolling a cigarette. Dan MacDonald, pioneer saloonman and gambler on the upper Yukon, owner and proprietor of the Tivoli and all its games, wandered forlornly across the great vacant space of floor and joined the two at the stove.

"Anybody dead?" the Virgin asked him.

"Looks like it," was the answer.

"Then it must be the whole camp," she said with an air of finality and with another yawn.

MacDonald grinned and nodded, and opened his mouth to speak, when the front door swung open and a man appeared in the light. He would have appeared a large man had not a huge French-Canadian stepped up to him from the bar and gripped his hand.

"Hello, Daylight!" was his greeting. "By Gar, you good for sore eyes!"

"Hello, Louis, when did you-all blow in?" returned the newcomer. "Come up and have a drink and tell us all about Bone creek. Why, dog-gone you-all, shake again. Where's that pardner of yours? I'm looking for him."

Another huge man detached himself from the bar to shake hands. Olaf Henderson and French Louis, partners together on Bone creek, were the two largest men in the country, and though they were but half a head taller than the newcomer, between them he was dwarfed completely.

"Hello, Olaf," said the one called Daylight. "Tomorrow's my birthday. And you, too, Louis. Come up and drink, and I'll tell you-all about it."

The arrival of the newcomer seemed to send a flood of warmth through the place. "It's Burning Daylight," the Virgin cried, the first to recognize him as he came into the light. Charley Bates' tight features relaxed at the sight, and MacDonald went over and joined the three at the bar. With the advent of Burning Daylight the whole place suddenly became brighter and cheerier. The barkeepers were active. Voices were raised. Somebody laughed. And when the fiddler, peering into the front room, remarked to the pianist: "It's Burning Daylight," the waltz time perceptibly quickened, and the dancers, catching the contagion, began to whirl about as if they really enjoyed it. It was known to them of old-time that nothing languished when Burning Daylight was around.

He turned from the bar and saw the woman by the stove and the eager look of welcome she extended him.

"Hello, Virgin, old girl," he called. "Hello, Charley. What's the matter with you-all? Why wear faces like that when coffins only cost three ounces? Come up, you-all, and drink. Come up, you unburied dead, an' name your poison. Come up, everybody. This is my night, and I'm going to ride it. To-morrow I'm thirty, and then I'll be an old man. It's the last fling of youth. Are you-all with me? Surge along, then. Surge along."

The waltz in the back room being finished, the three couples, followed by the fiddler and the pianist and heading for the bar, caught Daylight's eye.

"Surge along, you-all!" he cried. "Surge along and name it. This is my night, and it ain't a night that comes frequent. Surge up, you Siwashes and Salmon-eaters. It's my night, I tell you-all—"

"A blamed mangy night," Charley Bates interpolated.

"You're right, my son," Burning Daylight went on, gayly. "A mangy night, but it's my night, you see. I'm the mangy old he-wolf. Listen to me howl."

And howl he did, like a lone gray timber wolf, till the Virgin thrust her pretty fingers in her ears and shivered. A minute later she was whirled away in his arms to the dancing floor, where, along with three other women and their partners, a rollicking Virginia reel was soon in progress.

Few men knew Elam Harnish by any other name than Burning Daylight, the name which had been given him in the early days in the land because of his habit of routing his comrades out of their blankets with the complaint that daylight was burning. Of the pioneers in that far Arctic wilderness, where all men were pioneers, he was reckoned among the oldest. Men like Al Mayo and Jack McQuestion antedated him; but they had entered the land by crossing the Rockies from the Hudson Bay country to the east. He, however, had been the pioneer over the Chilcoot and Chilcat passes. In the spring of 1883, twelve years before, a stripling of eighteen, he had crossed over the Chilcoot with five comrades. In the fall he had crossed back with one. Four had perished by mischance in the bleak, uncharted vastness. And for twelve years Elam Harnish had continued to grope for gold among the shadows of the Circle. Heroes are seldom given to hero-worship, but among those of that land, young as he was, he was accounted an elder hero. In point of time he was before them. In point of deed he was beyond them.

"Surge Along, You-All!" He Cried. "Surge Along and Name It."

He was a striking figure of a man, of all the men in the Tivoli. Soft-tanned moccasins of moose-hide, beaded in Indian designs, covered his feet. His trousers were ordinary overalls, his coat was made from a blanket. Long-gauntletted leather mittens, lined with wool, hung by his side. They were connected, in the Yukon fashion by a leather thong passed around the neck and across the shoulders. On his head was a fur cap, the ear-flaps raised and the tying-cords dangling. His face, lean and slightly long, with the suggestion of hollows under the cheek bones, seemed almost Indian. The burnt skin and keen dark eyes contributed to this effect, though the bronze of the skin and the eyes themselves were essentially those of a white man. He looked older than thirty, and yet, smooth-shaven and without wrinkles, he was almost boyish. The impression of age was based on no tangible evidence. It came from the abstracter facts of the man, from what he had endured and survived, which was far beyond that of ordinary men. He had lived naked and tensely, and something of all this smoldered in his eyes, vibrated in his voice and seemed forever a whisper on his lips.

It was two in the morning when the dancers, bent on getting something to eat, adjourned the dancing for half an hour. And it was at this moment that Jack Kearns suggested poker. Jack Kearns was a big, bluff-featured man, who, along with Bettles, had made the disastrous attempt to found a post on the head-reaches of the Kayakuk, far inside the Arctic circle. After that Kearns had fallen back on his posts at Forty Mile and Sixty Mile and changed the direction of his ventures by sending out to the states for a small sawmill and a river steamer. Jack Kearns suggested poker. French Louis, Dan MacDonald and Hal Campbell (who had made a strike on Moosehide), all three of whom were not dancing because there were not girls enough to go around, inclined to the suggestion. They were looking for a fifth man when Burning Daylight emerged from the rear room, the Virgin on his arm, the train of dancers in his wake. In response to the hail of the poker-players, he came over to their table in the corner.

"Want to sit in," said Campbell. "How's your luck?"

"I sure got it tonight," Burning Daylight answered with enthusiasm, and at the same time felt the Virgin press his arm warningly. She wanted him for the dancing. "I sure got my luck with me, but I'd sooner dance. I ain't hankerin' to take the money away from you-all."

Nobody urged. They took his refusal as final, and the Virgin was pressing his arm to turn him away in pursuit of the supper-seekers, when he experienced a change of heart. It was not that he did not want to dance, nor that he wanted to hurt her; but that insistent pressure on his arm put his free man-nature in revolt. The thought in his mind was that he did not want any woman running him. Himself a favorite with women, nevertheless they did not bulk big with him. They were toys, playthings, part of the relaxation from the bigger game of life. He met women along with the whisky and gambling, and from observation he had found that it was far easier to break away from the drink and the cards than from a woman once the man was properly entangled. He resisted the pull on his arm by the mere negative mass of him, and said:

"I sort of feel a hankering to give you-all a flutter."

Tact and sympathy strove with him, and he smiled with his eyes into the Virgin's eyes as he said:

"You-all go and get some grub. I ain't hungry. And we'll dance some more by and by. The night's young yet. Go it, old girl."

He released his arm and thrust her playfully on the shoulder, at the same time turning to the poker players.

"Take off the limit and I'll go you-all."

"Limit's the roof," said Jack Kearns.

Once started, it was a quiet game, with little or no conversation, though all about the players the place was a-roar. Elam Harnish had ignited the spark. More and more miners dropped in to the Tivoli and remained. When Burning Daylight went on the tear, no man cared to miss it. The dancing floor was full. The luck at the table varied monotonously, no big hands being out. As a result, high play went on with small hands, though no play lasted long. But at three in the morning the big combination of hands arrived. It was the moment of moments that men wait weeks for in a poker game. The news of it tingled over the Tivoli. The onlookers became quiet. The men farther away ceased talking and moved over to the table. The players deserted the other games, and the dancing-floor was forsaken, so that all stood at last, fivescore and more in a compact and silent group, around the poker table. The high betting went on, with the draw yet in sight. Kearns had dealt, and French Louis had opened the pot with one marker—in his case one hundred dollars. Campbell had merely "seen" it, but Elam Harnish, coming next, had tossed in five hundred dollars, with the remark to MacDonald that he was letting him in easy. MacDonald, glancing again at his hand, put in a thousand in markers. Kearns, debating a long time over his hand, finally "saw." It then cost French Louis nine hundred to remain in the game, which he contributed after a similar debate. It cost Campbell likewise nine hundred to remain and draw cards, but to the surprise of all he saw the nine hundred and raised another thousand.

"We'll Dance Some More By and By. The Night's Young Yet."

"You-all are on the grade at last," Harnish remarked, as he saw the fifteen hundred and raised a thousand in turn. "Hello Breakfast's sure on top this divide, and you-all had best look out for bustin' harness."

"Me for that same lady," accompanied MacDonald's markers for two thousand and for an additional thousand-dollar raise.

"I ain't got no more markers," Kearns remarked plaintively. "We'd best begin I. O. U.'s."

"Glad you're going to stay," was MacDonald's cordial response.

"I ain't stayed yet. I've got a thousand in already. How's it stand now?"

"It'll cost you three thousand for a look in, but nobody will stop you from raising."

"Raise—h—l. You must think I got a pat like yourself." Kearns looked at his hand. "But I'll tell you what I'll do, Mac. I've got a hunch, and I'll just see that three thousand."

He wrote the sum on a slip of paper, signed his name, and consigned it to the center of the table.

French Louis became the focus of all eyes. He fingered his cards nervously for a space. Then, with a "By Gar! Ah got not one leetle bean hunch," he regretfully tossed his hand into the discards.

The next moment the hundred and odd pairs of eyes shifted to Campbell.

"I won't bump you, Jack," he said, contenting himself with calling the requisite two thousand.

The eyes shifted to Harnish, who scribbled on a piece of paper and shoved it forward.

"I'll just let you-all know this ain't no Sunday school society of philanthropy," he said. "I see you, Jack, and I raise you a thousand. Here's where you-all get action on your pat, Mac."

"Action's what I fatten on, and I lift another thousand," was MacDonald's rejoinder. "Still got that hunch, Jack?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Trouble, like a dog that chases a cat, is liable to pull up suddenly if you turn on him and stand pat—sure.

AFTER THE GRIP PURIFY THE BLOOD

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Are the Best Blood Builder and Will Cure You as They Cured This Woman.

It is of the utmost importance to your health, if you have suffered from the grip, that you cleanse the blood of the lingering germs and put it in condition to resist disease.

After the acute attack the sufferer is left with a debilitated system, is short of breath upon the slightest exertion and is affected by every change of weather. The system is in such a weakened condition that it is powerless to resist the attack of such diseases as pneumonia and bronchitis.

This is a condition which emphatically calls for a tonic for the blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are the best medicine for this purpose for they act directly on the blood which they cleanse of all impurities. They tone up the nerves and give health and strength to the debilitated system.

The debility which follows an attack of the grip can only be cured by making the blood rich and red. This Dr. Williams' Pink Pills never fail to do promptly and it explains how they cured Mrs. F. R. Boyd, of No. 607 South Ninth street, Minneapolis, Minn. She says:

"I was never well after an attack of the grip a few years ago until I took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Before this I had found nothing that helped me. I was all run down, pale and thin. My appetite was poor and my head ached continually. I didn't feel like myself at all.

"Someone finally recommended Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to me and I found them just the medicine for my case. They gave me a hearty appetite and a good, clear color. I got back my vitality and was soon a well woman. I can safely say that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills will do all that is claimed for them. I heartily recommend them."

If you are suffering from after-effects of the grip or other wasting disease, try the remedy that has cured so many stubborn cases, Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, upon receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y. A copy of our booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," is free on request.

Esther Was Alarmed.

Esther, a five-year-old daughter of north side parents, heard much about the dangers of diphtheria, and was eager to observe every precaution to keep from coming into contact with it, that she and her two brothers might not "catch it."

One day she insisted on going to the grocery on the corner to spend her penny, and was warned by her mother not to stop and play with any children she might meet on the way. After having been gone only a few minutes, she rushed into the house much excited, exclaiming as she entered:

"Mamma, you must keep 'ose boys away from Mr. A.'s house, 'cause they have diphtheria and have a sign up."

Her mother said: "Is that so? What does the sign say?"

"It says f-o-r s-a-l-e," said Esther.—Indianapolis News.

On to Her Job.

Mrs. Colin Gabble—Do you ever permit your husband to have his own way?

Mrs. Strongmind—Oh, yes, occasionally. He is sure to make a fool of himself, and that makes him easier to manage next time.

He Ought to Get It.

"On what grounds do you seek a divorce from your wife?" asked the lawyer.

"Simply because of a pun," replied the long suffering husband. "You see, she's a sculptress, and it gets on my nerves to hear her remark twenty times a day, 'Will you love me when I mold?'"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. [illegible]

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1906, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

We think that we have shown up what sort of government Engineers outfit the people are maintaining at St Paul, and how we shall take up our game and fish Commission of this state, and show them up as they are, by a publication of the kind assistance that they rendered the lumber companys to shut off Red Lake River and kill all the fish.

If our representatives in Washington are under control of the lumber companys and that Engineers office at St. Paul, we will know it by the close of this month and a meeting will be held by the farmers to organize. This meeting will not be called thru the nespapers but by private personal letters and no spy or hireling of the lumber companys will be invited If the government is going to protect the lumber companys in shutting off this river, the people will have to do something for self protection, and if it must come to that, the lumber companys will quit driving this river in less than a year, and quit of their own free will.

Almost simultaneonsly Sam Y Gordon of Browns Valley, and W.E. Lee of Long Prarie have announced that they will be candidates for the Republican nomination for governor, and the Progressives have about decided that N. J. Holmberg of Renville county shall be their candidate. These political events could not have been better timed had the people responsible for Mr. Gordon's embarrassing „Governor for a day" experience, planned that the rival candidates make their announcements simultaneonsly. At present it looks like a decided advantage for Governor Eberhart. The new candidates are in a divided field against the administration forces.

However, there are other indications in the situation. Clearly there is much opposition to Eberhart. The platfom declarations of Gordon and Lee are almost idontical except in phraseology. Many of the issues advanced are those approved by the Progressives. If the opposion to the administration could be united on one man the situation would become decidedly interesting. If for example, the Lee following should go to the Gordon camp at the opportune time and the Progressives turn to Gordon as the man able to accomplish the defeat of Eberhart, there would be a probability that the Browns Valley editor would have an opportunity to „laugh last." Unless the opposition to Eberhart becomes united it will be an easy victory for the administration forces.—Red Lake Falls Gazette

NOTHING DANGEROUS.

Charles B Cheney, who manipulates the political syringe in the Minneapolis Journal, after commenting on the lack of La Follete supports in Minnesota, discusses alleged troubles loming up before Congressman Steenerson as follows.

„Since the developments of the Indian inquiry by the congressional committee sitting in Minneapolis, there is renewed talk of opposition to Halvor Steenerson for nomination in the ninth district. Possible competitors of Steenerson spoken of are F.H. Peterson of Moorhead, former state senator, Dr. O.M. Haugen of Fergus Falls, Judge Andrew Grindeland of Warren, and Henry O. Bjorge of Lake Park, who made the effort two years ago."—Crookston Times.

We would consider that inquirey at Minneapolis a ridiculus farce, so far as injuring the political chances of Congressman Steenerson in the 9th. District are concerned. That adoption of the Tall Norsk into the Chippewa tribe was only a joke, and Mr. Steenerson was endeavoring to please the Indians by carrying out his part of it. But as for any harm being intended, or any attempt to defrand Indians out of land, is to foolish a statement to put in print, and if the oppsition to Steenerson can not find any other peg to hang their hat on, they had "better go way back sit down."

Several of the above named gentlemen have had one race with Steenerson, and if they want another one the track is open. Jump in gentlemen.

THE PAUSE AT DINNER.

Grim Story of an Englishman's Banquet in Egypt.

How completely in any domestic emergency the master can count on his Berber servants is illustrated by this grim anecdote from Mrs. E. L. Butcher's book, "Egypt as We Knew It." An Englishman of very high rank in the Egyptian service wished to give in his own house a dinner party to the prime minister and other Egyptian and English notables. He was a bachelor and did not often entertain, but he spoke to his servants and told them that he particularly wished the dinner to be successful.

The Egyptian, or, rather, Berber, servant has a quick sense for the honor of "our house," as every good servant calls his master's abode. So the servants bestirred themselves, and the guests sat down to an excellent dinner beautifully served.

Good fish succeeded good soup, and then there was a pause. The host talked his best, but began to feel nervous. However, after a delay hardly long enough to attract the notice of the guests the even procession of dishes began again, and the evening was most successful.

After the guests had departed the host said a word of praise to his head servant and then remarked:

"By the way, there was rather a long wait after the fish. Why was that?"

"May it please your excellency, the cook died of cholera."

"What!"

But investigation put the fact beyond a doubt. The cook, attacked at the last moment, but anxious for the honor of the house, had worked on till he fell dead at his post, and his body had been then hastily laid aside and the marmiton finished the cooking.

I learned this story after the Englishman had left the country. I never heard that any of the guests suffered or even knew what had happened.

The latest news from Martain McAndress, of St.Hilaire is that he is very low, and Mr.and Mrs. Walter McAndress are remaining at his bedside. We hope soon to hear that he is on the way to recovery.

The farmers who reduced their stock last fall, owing to the closing of Red Lake River, are lucky even if they did sell cheap, as the water situation is becoming desperate, and the loss of stock will be heavy if the outlet of Red Lake is not opened soon.

It is getting to be a very difficult matter to find any water for stock in the Red Lake River, as the deepest holes are now frozen nearly to the bottom. It is to bad that the lumber companys did not give the settlers notice that they were going to close Red Lake River, and that they were the ones that controlled it, instead of the government.

The water is said to be deep enough above the dam at Thief River Falls to cut ice, but it will be pretty stinking stuff to put into a refrigerator next summer, to cool the butter that some of them can eat on their bread, who so nobly stood by the lumber companys, in shutting off Red Lake River.

The farmers living along the Red Lake River will not be able to put up any ice for their summer use, as the lumber companys have appropriated the river to their own use. Of course it was not so bad when they appropriated the government Engineers office at St.Paul, and the Game and fish Commission of this state to their own use, but when they took the river it was hogish.

GIVEADAM NOTES.

More Coruscations From the Arizona Kicker.

ITS ENORMOUS CIRCULATION.

Some Comparisons With the Feeble Efforts of the Newspapers of the Effete East—A Few Items of Inside Information and Some Personalities.

By M. QUAD.

[Copyright, 1911, by Associated Literary Press.]

THE flying machine has not yet reached Giveadam Gulch, but all our two gun men are ready and waiting for it.

Out of 200 weather predictions made in the Kicker only seven turned out as advertised, but we are mighty proud of that. We had no idea we should hit more than two.

Mr. George Shrader, a Chicago drummer, found fault with his bed at the Royal hotel the other night and had to be shot in the leg. Mr. Shrader was making his first trip out this way.

The printer's ink consumed in the Kicker office in one week would make a river 50 feet wide, 10 feet deep and 100 miles long. These figures may startle some people, but we regard them as mere trifles. We rather expect to rival the Ohio river in another year.

THE PRINTER'S INK CONSUMED IN THE KICKER OFFICE WOULD MAKE A RIVER FIFTY FEET WIDE.

This is our regular week for lying about our circulation and advertising, and therefore we proceed to state that during the past year we have published more "want" ads. than all the other newspapers in the world. We are not bragging about it, but merely mentioning the trifling incident. Some of the New York dailies would blow around for weeks on such a record.

The number of subscriptions received from Asia alone last week totaled up over half a million. Our subscription staff, numbering over 700 persons, had to work five minutes extra to list the names, but they were willing to do that much for us.

The last issue of the Kicker was fifteen seconds late owing to the breaking down of our 227 presses simultaneously. We have just ordered 450 new presses that we may have a reserve, and our readers will not again be disappointed.

It takes 900 tons of coal per day to supply the engines at this office; but, as we own 5,000,000 acres of coal lands and mine our own coal, we let the boys fire up and run the old thing full blast. We often have as many as 600 loaded cars in the back yard at once.

The advertising volumns of the Kicker have become so crowded that we must notify the public that all advertising intended for the year 1913 should be sent in at once. We have also advanced our rates to $50 a line and may even have to double that figure. It's easy to run a newspaper when you know how.

Our 127 paper mills had to work over time all last month to keep us supplied with white paper, and we had to establish thirty additional mills to take the pressure off. If these rolls of paper were pasted together they would reach thirty-nine times around the globe and then have enough left over to reach five times around Dr. Cook.

The Kicker supplies all its employees with a free lunch every day at noon. It takes 1,764 bottles of champagne and 143 cold chickens to give this lunch the proper zest, but we were always a free handed cuss who liked to see other folks happy. Of course only pure Irish linen tablecloths are provided, and they are washed and ironed after every lunch.

There may be some folks who wonder where we get the money to run things on the generous scale we do. That is the least of our troubles. While the dinky little dailies of New York, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia are counting their pennies we have 154 blond young ladies taking in and counting the money received by six different daily mails. Every afternoon at 4 o'clock a big moving van backs up to the office to be loaded [illegible] and be driven to our three national banks. This daily incident used to draw a crowd, but our people have got so used to it now that it provokes no curiosity. A million dollars more or less is a trifle in Giveadam Gulch.

The Kicker isn't bragging about it, but its editorial policy sways the whole world. All its suggestions are followed in Siberia, as well as in Pennsylvania. It has made and unmade presidents, kings, czars and emperors. It killed reciprocity in a three line paragraph. It drove Castro out of Venezuela with five lines. If it decides that Mr. Roosevelt shall be our next president he will get there. If it decides that he shan't then he may pack his grip and hunt the hilarious rhinoceros again.

And who is this Jim Hellso, editor and proprietor of the Kicker, mayor of Giveadam Gulch, postmaster of the same, colonel of militia, state game warden, candidate for the next governor of Arizona, etc.? Just a common skate of a feller. Goes around with an old suit on him and doesn't look as if he could pull cucumbers off the vines. You only find out that he can give those eastern chaps cards and spades in running a newspaper when you come to read what he has done.

There is a shyster lawyer here in the Gulch who is suffering for a change of climate. His name is Start, and if he doesn't make one within a week we shall call at his office with two guns to ask why he lingers. Mr. Start has been in town six months, and during that time he has encouraged about fifty people to go to law instead of resting the justice of their cases on the gun. We do not propose to stand by and see our social system overturned without protest.

In an absentminded way as we stood talking with a stranger on the street the other day we spat on his feet. We had no idea that we had done anything so discourteous until he pulled a gun and snipped a button off our coat. Thinking him an assassin, we pulled a gun and shot the end of his thumb off. Then explanations were made and pardons begged, and all was lovely. Nothing is further from our thoughts than to insult any one by our personal demeanor. If we eject tobacco juice around rather recklessly it is because we are occupied with thoughts of great things.

Colonel Davis of the Big Four began shooting at us when we first declined to publish his poetry, which was all of three years ago. He has never succeeded in hitting us yet, but he bothers and annoys, and if his conduct doesn't improve we shall some day tear out a sidewalk plank and hit him across the small of the back. We have allowed him to have a good thing long enough.

A mail carrier on the Lone Jack route reports snow two feet deep in the mountains already, and on his last trip the timber wolves nipped the heels off his boots. Wolves are a good thing to expedite the mails, and as postmaster we shall encourage them.

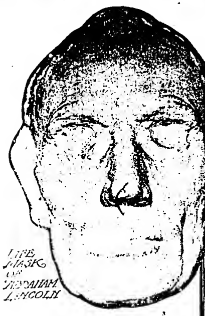
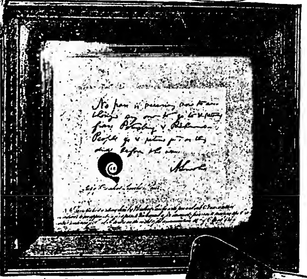
The Most Interesting Lincoln Relics

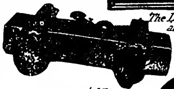


LIFE MASK OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

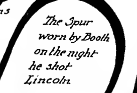
ALTHOUGH it is little more than half a century since the death of Abraham Lincoln, discoveries of heretofore unknown relics of the martyr president are of rare occurrence. Indeed, we hear of the disclosure of additional relics of George Washington more frequently than of additions to the known list of mementoes of the Civil War President. One explanation, perhaps, is found in the fact that there are comparatively few private collections of Lincoln relics. It is as though the wealthy men who have expended such vast sums to unearth trophies of Washington, Napoleon and other heroes had not yet awakened to the importance of the souvenirs of Lincoln.



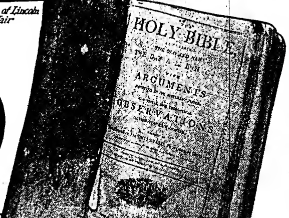
The Last Handwriting of Lincoln and a Lock of his Hair



Model of one of Lincoln's inventions, made by Lincoln himself



The Spur worn by Booth on the night he shot Lincoln



THE LINCOLN FAMILY BIBLE

Lincoln's Office Chair, used in his law office at Springfield, Ill.

Doubtless the quest on the part of private individuals for Lincoln relics would be pursued more energetically were it not for the manifest difficulty of securing Lincoln's former belongings and the yet greater difficulty of authenticating many of the objects that purport to be Lincoln relics. The martyr president rose from comparative obscurity and this in itself has made it difficult to locate minor objects connected with his boyhood and early life. Then, too, the circumstance that his activities covered widely-separated localities in Kentucky, Illinois, etc., has further complicated the task of tracing his one-time belongings. Lincoln relics, when they do come into the market via the medium of collectors' auction sales, invariably bring big prices. A Lincoln autograph or especially an autograph letter will always provoke spirited bidding; damaged and discarded pieces of the White House china made for Mrs. Lincoln and used on the presidential table during the Lincoln administration command prices of $30 to $50 each; and a lock of Lincoln's hair recently brought $800 when sold at auction.

Some of the most interesting of the Lincoln relics are believed to be in the possession of Mr. Robert Lincoln, the only living son of the martyr president. However, Mr. Lincoln, who has but lately retired as president of the Pullman Car company, has not only never exhibited his relics publicly, but has never taken the public into his confidence regarding the exact character of the mementoes he possesses or what ultimate disposition he has planned to make of them. Even more valuable, however, than the Robert T. Lincoln collection is that which represents the life work of Osborn H. Oldroyd, a veteran of the Civil war and a most devoted admirer of Lincoln. It stands today as the greatest collection ever compiled by one man in tribute to a popular hero and its value has been variously estimated at from $100,000 to $250,000.

The collector began to accumulate Lincoln relics some time before the Springfield lawyer was nominated for president, and he has continued his labor of love ever since, with the result that he now has considerably more than 3,000 articles pertaining to the great idol. Some years ago the Congress of the United States gave him permission to place his relics in the house in Washington in which Lincoln died, and this unpretentious brick structure, which is now owned by Uncle Sam, has since been the home, rent free, of this persistent collector and the treasures which he has gathered together from all parts of the country at great expense.

What is generally accounted the most valuable of all Lincoln relics has a prominent place in this self-same collection. It consists of a heavy frame, sheltering under glass the last communication ever penned by Lincoln and, attached to the precious missive, a lock of Lincoln's hair. This souvenir, which was originally in the possession of the man who was steward at the White House during the Lincoln regime, is valued at $5,000, but it is doubtful if even that sum would buy it today. Persons who have been ignorant of the existence of this relic have designated other communications as the final handwriting of the martyr president, but in reality the honor unquestionably belongs to this small white card with its few hastily-penned lines. Novel and interesting are the circumstances connected with the origin of this priceless memento.

As Lincoln emerged from the White House on the fated night of April 14, 1865, on his way to Ford's theater, the steward hurried after him to explain the predicament of two gentlemen who had been waiting at the White House for some time in order to obtain from the president a permit to pass through the Union lines to Petersburg, Va. It was the theater hour and Mrs. Lincoln was already seated in the carriage, but the ever-obliging president paused a few minutes to write a few lines, explaining that no pass was necessary to go and return from Petersburg and Richmond and that "People go and return just as they did before the war." He handed this to the steward, reiterating verbally the statement made in the penned memorandum. The steward, realizing that the written explanation was really superfluous, and seizing a long-sought opportunity to secure a trophy of the beloved president, retained in his own possession the bit of handwriting and repeated to the waiting visitors the president's oral assurances on the subject. Later, after the death of Lincoln, the steward induced the physician in charge to allow him to have a lock of Lincoln's hair.

One of the most interesting of the relics identified with the life of Lincoln before he entered the White House is the family Bible—considerably more than one hundred years old—which contains the family chronicle usually recorded in the spaces provided in such a book. From this well-worn volume Lincoln's mother read the Scriptures to him when he was a boy and on the inside cover is the autograph of Lincoln written when he was nine years of age. The cook stove, used by the Lincoln family in the homestead at Springfield, Ill., and the cradle in which all the Lincoln children were rocked have likewise been carefully preserved. Equally significant is the old arm-chair which Lincoln used for years in his law offices at Springfield and in which, following his election to the presidency, he sat pondering by the hour over the problems that confronted him.

Abraham Lincoln was something of an inventor and one of the most highly prized of all the Lincoln relics has to do with his efforts in the field of invention. It is a model designed to illustrate the workings of an ingenious mechanism for changing at will the angles of the wheels of a wagon or other vehicle, and the most interesting feature of it is that this little wooden vehicle represents Lincoln's own handiwork, having been laboriously fashioned while he was a young lawyer waiting for clients in Illinois. Another model of a Lincoln invention—a steamboat—was deposited in the patent office and is now the possession of the United States government.

The life and death masks of Abraham Lincoln are, of course, tremendously important as conveying to the present and future generations the exact appearance of this famous man in life and in death. A mask, it will be understood, is a plaster cast of a countenance which reproduces faithfully its every detail. One of the life masks of Lincoln that has been preserved was made in 1860, just after Lincoln's first nomination for president, the work being done by a sculptor who accompanied the notification committee to Springfield. Another life mask was made about a month before Lincoln's death. The death mask is perhaps the representation which shows the martyr president as he is best known to the public through pictures and statuary.

Among the relics that have been carefully preserved by the government and by private individuals such as Mr. Oldroyd are many bearing upon the great tragedy which ended Lincoln's career. One of these relics is the flag which was draped in front of the president's box at Ford's theater, the night when Lincoln was shot. The flag shows plainly the rent made by Booth's spur when it caught in the folds as he leaped from the box to the stage. Another interesting relic is the spur itself, which made trouble for the assassin by causing him to fall heavily, breaking his leg and, in consequence, seriously hampered his flight.

IN THE WILDS OF CANADA

"The interior of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario is nothing but a continuous stretch of dense forest, much of which has been burned over in days gone by, so that the deadfall was considerable," writes Frederick A. Talbot, telling of the surveys for the Grand Trunk Pacific railroad in the Engineering Magazine. "The forest was for the most part trackless, the Indians and trappers moving through this inhospitable country along the obviously easy channels—the waterways. Huge stretches of muskeg were encountered, for the land is in sore need of draining. As the western boundary of the province of Ontario is approached the country becomes more broken, lakes and swamps being intersected by stretches of badly broken rocky hills. From Lake Nipigon westward to the boundary of Manitoba the worst country between the Atlantic and Pacific had to be penetrated with great difficulty and arduousness.

"For the purpose of the surveys an elaborate organization had to be perfected, in order to ship in supplies and keep the surveyors well equipped with provisions. For six months of the year the country was in the grip of snow, the fall of which is heavy, while the thermometer drops to very low readings. As the nearest railway communication was 100 or more miles to the south, supplies had to be packed over and numerous caches had to be established. Tote roads were driven for team work as far as practicable in summer, trails had to be blazed to permit of the passage of the half-breeds (who, because of the physique and stamina were pressed freely into service for carrying supplies on their backs), while large fleets of canoes of every description were acquired, the waterways being followed so far as possible. Packing by mules and horses could not be practiced extensively, owing to the muskeg and the absence of fodder, for the country was unsupporting to animal life while the shipping in of hay would have been impossible except at the expense of more urgent necessities. Owing to the uncharted character of the rivers canoeing demands extraordinary skill, and after the first few months' experience where unfamiliarity with these waterways was attended by considerable losses in boats and valuable supplies, only men familiar with the country, such as those in the employ of the Hudson Bay company, were permitted to handle these craft. Even then occasional losses were sustained and the stores of provisions suffered extensively from the ill effects of portaging, which was frequent and heavy. During the winter communication with the hinterland was maintained solely by means of dog sleighs, large numbers of these animals being acquired from the [illegible] and bred for this service."

"I understand," said the sympathetic friend, "that you borrowed money and are busy trying to pay the interest."

"Yes," replied Mr. Bliggins, "it has been a case of take the credit and let the cash go."

OF THE AGE OF CHIVALRY

Fat Victim of Cupid Bashfully Acknowledges Real Reason for His Act of Heroism.

The smallest boy had broken through the ice and the fat boy was crawling to his rescue.

"Come back, Fatty!" the other boys shrieked. "You'll bust it all in, an' den youse'll both be drowned!"

But the fat boy, flat on his stomach and spread out to his widest extent, ignored these warning cries and steadily crept toward the black hole and Tommy's clinging fingers.

Once the ice made a cracking sound and the watchers yelled with dismay. But the fat boy did not halt. Nearer and nearer he came, and finally his outstretched hands caught those clinging fingers and drew the small boy, little by little, onto the firmer ice and so to safety.

"What did youse do it for, Fatty?" one of the boys tearfully remonstrated.

"Aw," replied the hero, "I knew what I lost in weight I made up in wideness, see?"

Then his face softened.

"Besides," he bashfully said, "I'm sweet on Tommy's sister!"

Felt Rather Fat.

"Mamma, I had the nicest dream," said little Mary, aged six, just after waking in the morning.

"What was it?" momma asked.

"Why, I dreamt I was a young lady," the child explained.

"That felt pretty good, didn't it?" the mother remarked.

"Yes," was the reply. "But I felt rather fat."

PIMPLES COVERED HIS BACK

"My troubles began along in the summer in the hottest weather and took the form of small eruptions and itching and a kind of smarting pain. It took me mostly all over my back and kept getting worse until finally my back was covered with a mass of pimples which would burn and itch at night so that I could hardly stand it. This condition kept getting worse and worse until my back was a solid mass of big sores which would break open and run. My underclothing would be a clot of blood.

"I tried various remedies and salves for nearly three years and I was not getting any benefit. It seemed I was in eternal misery and could not sleep on my back or lean on a chair. I was finally given a set of the Cuticura Remedies and inside of two weeks I could see and feel a great relief. I kept on using Cuticura Soap, Ointment and also the Resolvent, and in about three or four months' time my back was nearly cured and I felt like a new being. Now I am in good health and no sign of any skin diseases and I am fully satisfied that Cuticura Remedies are the best ever made for skin diseases. I would not be without them." (Signed) W. A. Armstrong, Corbin, Ken., May 26, 1911. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston.

SEVEN YEARS OF MISERY

How Mrs. Bethune was Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Sikeston, Mo. — "For seven years I suffered everything. I was in bed for four or five days at a time every month, and so weak I could hardly walk. I had cramps, backache and headache, and was so nervous and weak that I dreaded to see anyone or have anyone move in the room. The doctors gave me medicine to ease me at those times, and said that I ought to have an operation. I would not listen to that, and when a friend of my husband's told him about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and what it had done for his wife, I was willing to take it. Now I look the picture of health and feel like it, too. I can do all my own housework, work in the garden and entertain company and enjoy them, and can walk as far as any ordinary woman, any day in the week. I wish I could talk to every suffering woman and girl, and tell them what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me."—Mrs. DEMA BETHUNE, Sikeston, Mo.

Remember, the remedy which did this was Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

It has helped thousands of women who have been troubled with displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, that bearing down feeling, indigestion, and nervous prostration, after all other means have failed. Why don't you try it?

ORE REPORT FILED

COVERS OPERATION OF CONCERN EXTENDING OVER PERIOD OF SEVERAL YEARS.

A DETAILED HISTORY

Deduction of $7,500,000 Dividend Leaves Surplus of $1,572,073—Formation of Trust Reviewed.

New York, N. Y. — The pamphlet report of the Great Northern iron ore properties for the fiscal year ended Dec. 31 last, has been issued. Following the comparative statement of receipts and disbursements for the 12 months ended Dec. 31 last in comparison with the year previous:

	1911.	Inc.
Dividends received.	$365,434	$260,434
Sundry receipts ...	12,006	5,526
Total receipts	2,377,440	265,961
Exp. adm. Tr	88,198	20,570
Bal. for dividends..	2,289,242	245,391
*Dividends	750,000	1,500,000
Surplus	1,539,242	1,745,391
*Prev. surplus	32,831	206,149
Total surplus	1,572,073	1,539,242

*Decrease

The report contains a statement of earnings of the Great Northern ore properties from Dec. 7, 1906, to Dec. 31, 1911, as follows:

Total receipts, $9,446,376; salaries and expenses $374,303; balance $9,072,073; dividends $7,500,000; surplus $1,572,073. Total receipts of the properties from the date of formation of the trust to Dec. 31, 1911, were $17,615,828; total disbursements $14,661,876 and net receipts $2,953,952. Of this amount $2,033,942 represents the balance of cash, considering collections and payments, accrued as 1911 business and $920,010 invested in securities.

The balance sheet as of Dec. 31, last follows: Assets—Balance due from proprietary companies, $2,698,294; investment securities, $920,010; cash and accounts receivable, less accounts payable, $2,033,942; total assets $5,652,246. Liabilities—balances due to proprietary companies $2,802,309; minimum royalties received from the Great Western Mining company, $2,849,937; total liabilities, $5,652,246.

The report says: "Leases to operating companies in effect at the date of execution of the trust agreement of Dec. 7, 1906, continue unchanged. The Great Western Mining company has given notice that it has elected in accordance with the terms of its lease, to terminate the same on Jan. 1, 1915. While the lease will continue in operation, according to its terms, until that date, its termination on Jan. 1, 1915, will present questions for the decision of the trustees regarding future management of the properties. No general statement of future policy can be made at this time, but in order that a clear understanding may be had of such action as the trustees may decide to take, a detailed history of the transactions of the trust since Dec. 7, 1906, to Dec. 31, 1911, is presented in the report."

NO BIBLE AT MANKATO

Mankato.—The reading of the Bible at the opening exercises in the high school has ceased, after having been in vogue for many years, without objection on anybody's part. At the last meeting of the school board one of the members, J. E. Regan, objected to the practice, saying that two or three persons had spoken to him against it. He moved that the custom be discontinued, but received no second to his motion, and the other members expressed sorrow that the point had been raised. Other Catholic members of the board disagreed with him. However, Mr. Regan said that the reading of the Bible would have to cease, and so notified the city superintendent.

Superintendent Sperry took the matter up with C. G. Schulz, superintendent of public instruction, and has received the following reply:

"St. Paul.—In reply to your inquiry, let me say that Attorney General Childs, in an opinion rendered in December, 1895, held that reading any portion of the Bible or repetition of the Lord's prayer in the public schools is in violation of the constitution of Minnesota, and therefore prohibited. The opinion still remains in force as a law at present. You are, therefore, advised that under this interpretation the practice which you say has prevailed in the high school at Mankato of reading passages from the old testament and reciting the Lord's prayer is not in harmony with the constitution of Minnesota as interpreted by Attorney General Childs. Yours very truly, C. G. Schulz."

It is said the practice of Bible reading is carried on in many schools of the state. In one or more country school districts in this county it is said Catholic services are carried out without objection by other residents of the district.

CREAMERY PROSPEROUS

Over 250 Attend Meeting and Banquet at Plainview.

Plainview.—The annual meeting of the Greenwood Prairie Creamery association was held here and a feature was a dinner provided by the patrons and partaken of by over 250 persons. J. R. Morley of Owatonna spoke on "Creameries and Their Needs." A resolution asking the school board to add an agricultural department to the Plainview high school was adopted.

STEENERSON IS CAUSTIC

Discusses White Earth Troubles in a Statement.

Washington, D. C.—The issues arising out of the White Earth Indian reservation controversy were aired in a broadside delivered by Representative Steenerson of Minnesota. Striking out at all who have criticized the laws relating to White Earth reservation matters, and directing his attack in many particulars at M. C. Burch, special assistant attorney general of the department of justice, Mr. Steenerson did not hesitate to assail those who have made what he asserts are incorrect statements about conditions at White Earth and the operations of the federal laws relating to the reservation.

The statement was brought out primarily by a published account of charges made by Mr. Burch that the federal laws had enabled the lumber companies to evade the laws of the state prohibiting such companies from holding more than 5,000 acres of land. After showing how President Taft, in public utterances, rebuked those who were undermining public confidence in officials by attacks upon the judiciary Mr. Steenerson declared that the charge made by Mr. Burch was a reflection upon Judge Page Morris, who was the author of one of the important White Earth land laws.

LOSS IN TAXATION

Moneys and Credits Valuation $38,984 Less Than 1910.

St. Paul.—The state tax commission issued a statement summarizing the operation of the new law for taxation of moneys and credits. Under the act they were assessed in 1911 for the first time at a flat rate of 3 mills on the dollar, which was designed to bring about general listing of moneys and credits. Though the actual taxes received from this class of property were less by $38,984.79 than in 1910, the tax commissioners are well pleased with the first trial of the law, and expect to see a large increase in revenue in 1912.

The statement shows the 1910 valuations of moneys and credits to have been $13,919,806, which brought $385,430.21 in taxes. The 1911 valuation was $115,481,807, and the 3-mill tax brought $346,445.42 in taxes. There was an increase in revenue in sixty-seven counties, amounting to $83,371.55, while nineteen counties showed a total decrease of $122,356.34. The big decrease was in Hennepin county, Minneapolis alone showing a loss of $96,119.42 in revenue. Decreases in the other counties were small.

MINISTER IS EXPELLED

Charges Against Rev. Mr. Foster, of Fulda, Sustained by Presbytery.

Sioux Falls, S. D.—At a meeting just held here by the Presbytery of Sioux Falls, the former action of the presbytery in suspending from the church for one year Rev. Frank Leighton Foster, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Fulda, Minn., was affirmed.

In the fall of 1910 Rev. Mr. Foster was tried by the Sioux Falls presbytery and found guilty of conduct unbecoming a minister of the gospel, and suspended for one year, with the privilege of producing new evidence that might be in his favor. The presbytery at the first trial based its decision mainly on the decree of divorce granted by the Supreme Court of the State of New York to the wife of Foster on statutory grounds.

At a meeting of the Presbyterian Synod of South Dakota, at Madison, a few weeks ago, Mr. Foster filed an appeal for a new trial, on the ground that new evidence had been discovered that would clear him of all charges. The request was granted and the case referred back to the Presbytery of Sioux Falls for retrial.

GUARDIAN HOLDS HIS JOB

Woodville Case Up Again—Probate Court's Order Reversed.

Faribault.—The affairs of Robert W. Woodville of this county have taken another turn. Woodville is the man who wanted to marry a young woman of Minneapolis, and for whom relatives had a guardian appointed after he had been released from the insane asylum.

Joseph Donaldson of Northfield was appointed by the court as guardian. After Woodville's release on parole an effort was made to have him restored to competency, but after a hearing the petition was denied. In January, 1911, a petition was filed in the probate court asking for the removal of Donaldson as guardian and the appointment of Thomas Grove of Northfield. After a hearing the court filed an order removing Donaldson and appointing Andrew Murphy. From this order Donaldson appealed.

The attorney for Donaldson moved the district court that the order of the probate court be reversed on the ground that the petitioner had failed to produce any testimony to prove his allegations. Judge Childress granted the motion.

FARMERS' INSTITUTE

Will Be Held at Barnesville on Feb. 15 and 16.

Barnesville.—Thursday and Friday, Feb. 15 and 16, have been designated as the dates for the farmers' institute to be held in this city. A prize will be awarded to the boy who raises the best acre of corn and potatoes for this year, the decision to be in the hands of a local committee. The winner also has a chance at the state prize.

AN ADOPTED INDIAN

WHITE EARTH CHIEF TESTIFIES REGARDING ALLOTMENT OFFERED CONGRESSMAN.

WHITE EARTH INQUIRY

Fred Dennis, Once Secretary to Congressman—Says an Application Was Signed to Please the Indians.

Minneapolis. —Representative Steenerson's statement in Washington that he had made an application for an allotment on the White Earth reservation, following the passage of the Steenerson act, as a matter of courtesy to the Indians who had adopted him into their tribe, was supported before the Indian investigating committee when Mr. Steenerson's former secretary, Fred Dennis, of Detroit, Minn., was called as a witness.

Mr. Dennis, after identifying Mr. Steenerson's signature to a paper which was then introduced in evidence by the attorneys of the department of justice as an application for a tract of 166 acres on the reservation, testified that Mr. Steenerson had been asked to take the land at the annual tribal celebration in 1905, by Chief Michi-chigesik; that he had declined to take it then, saying that he would "take the land in his heart;" and that he signed the application only when it was later sent to him at Washington with the statement that its refusal would offend the Indians.

Never Gone to Land.

Mr. Dennis declared that Mr. Steenerson had never gone on the land to select the tract, the application having been made out for him. Chief Michi-chi-gesik, on the occasion of Mr. Steenerson's adoption, had suggested, according to Mr. Dennis, that Mr. Steenerson accept his own tract.

Mr. Steenerson's Washington statement with reference to the application had been called out by the published report that the attorneys of the department of justice were seeking to prove before the investigating committee that the Steenerson act was one of a series which led to the defrauding of the Indians of the reservation and that they would introduce what purported to be his application for land under the act which bears his name.

Adoption Declared Resented.

Rev. Charles Wright, son of Chief White Cloud, who is recognized by the full bloods as their chief, said that Mr. Steenerson's adoption into the tribe had been resented. He declared that he had protested to the Indian commissioner when he heard that a proffer of land had been made to Mr. Steenerson, saying that Mr. Steenerson was a well-to-do man who did not need the land, while many Mille Lac Indians were in a condition of destitution.

The witness testified that he had been opposed to the adoption of Mr. Steenerson into the tribe as a veteran for securing the passage of the act giving the Indians their allotments, because he had believed that there already was a law to that effect.

He said he believed the allotments would have been secured without the act. The chief declined to agree with Gus Beaulieu, who questioned him, that Mr. Steenerson's act had made good what had been only a promise. The chief said he did not attend the council which adopted Mr. Steenerson.

Edward Santwiller, a railway conductor of Minneapolis, also testified that Agent Michelet had volunteered to get him fee simple patents to his allotments for $10. He said he discovered that it was not necessary to pay the commission and, on telling Michelet so, the latter admitted that it was not, but that he had asked it for assistance in hurrying the patents through. At that time, he stated, he was not of age, but he would not testify that Michelet knew of that fact.

Rev. Charles Wright related experiences which revealed that full blood Chippewas of the reservation, who particularly look to him as a chief, though himself of mixed blood, were playing a subordinate role in the Indian politics of the reservation. He declared that he had been offered a $5,000 stand of pine if he "would let the full bloods alone." President Roosevelt, he said, had declined to see him when he went to Washington on Indian matters, though armed with letters of introduction from Governor Johnson and Senator Nelson, unless the Indian office assented, and the Indian office had written him that it would not be convenient for the president to see him.

GOPHER LADS IN JAIL

Thief River Falls Boys Arrested at Pasadena, Cal.

Pasadena, Cal. — After traveling without money from Thief River Falls, Minn., in a course which in miles amounted practically to a trip across the continent, Albert Erickson, aged 19, and Charles Miller, aged 17, are in the city jail on charges of petty larceny. The boys confess to stealing two bicycles. They say they grew tired of walking.

HOUSEWORK IS A HEAVY BURDEN

The woman who "keeps house" has enough to do when she is in good, sound health, but if she is weak, tired all the time, and suffering from morn to night with an aching back, housework becomes a heavy burden.

Many women who were afflicted in this way say that Doan's Kidney Pills have made life easier for them.

Women are subject to kidney disease. The clothing they wear, the work they do, the worry and strain of bearing and rearing children, the lack of proper exercise; all tend to it.

Backache, bearing-down pains, headache, dizzy spells, faintness, fits of "blues," and other troubles often thought to be peculiar to the sex, are found frequently in kidney disease. When any one of these ills appears, together with a discolored condition of the kidney secretions, with passages too frequent, scanty or burning, just make up your mind that your kidneys are weak, and be quick to help them.

Doan's Kidney Pills have helped a great many weak women through the trying times when kidney disease means so much added misery. They do not disturb the stomach or bowels and contain no poisonous, dangerous or habit-forming drugs. Doan's are harmless for children too.

When Kidney Troubles Keep You in Misery Day and Night

"Every Picture Tells A Story"

"I just can't get up!"

The following case is typical of the cures effected by Doan's Kidney Pills. Grateful testimony is the best evidence.

DRIVEN ALMOST CRAZY.

A Terrible Tale of Kidney Suffering.

Mrs. H. W. Heagy, 1515 L St., Bakersfield, Cal., says: "My kidney trouble began in the fall of 1907. I used remedy after remedy prescribed by physicians but no relief came and I was in despair. On account of the numbness and grating sensation I could not lie down comfortably and some nights I was not in bed half an hour. I became so nervous and restless I hardly knew what to do. Hot waves came over me like a flash and I became so dizzy that I staggered. I had a feeling as if there was gravel in my bladder, the kidney secretions acting too freely at times, while again they were very scant and accompanied by terrible pain. I cannot describe the suffering I endured for over two years. Finally I began using Doan's Kidney Pills and while I did not notice much relief for a week or so, I continued persistently and when I had taken eight boxes I was feeling fine. The numbness and smarting finally left, the kidney secretions became clear and natural and my health improved one hundred percent. Doan's Kidney Pills cured me at a time when it seemed that I would go crazy and I never can express my gratitude."

Child's Reasoning.

"I can't tell you anything about my grandpa," said solemn little Eustace, questioned by a happier comrade as to his more recent ancestor, "because I never had any. All my grandparents died before I was born."

"But you had grandparents just the same, dear," interpolated a listening adult. "The fact that they died before you were born doesn't alter the fact that they were your grandparents."

"But if our fathers and mothers had died before we were born they wouldn't have been our fathers and mothers, would they?" the wondering child questioned. "So I don't see how what you say can be true."

WOMEN AND HEALTH.

Women are beginning to realize more fully that good health is not to be found in the use of cosmetics and face powders. The appearance of health may follow facial treatment, but health itself lies much deeper than the surface.

Most important to the health of every women is regularity of the bowels and digestive organs. The weary eyes, bad breath, frequent headaches, pimples and general air of lassitude, is in most every case due to constipation or indigestion, or both. There are various remedies prescribed for this condition, but the easiest, most pleasant and certainly effective, is a combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin known to druggists as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This simple remedy is far preferable to harsh salts and cathartics and violent purgative waters that disturb the whole system without affording more than temporary relief.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a tonic laxative, mild in its action, pleasant to the taste and positive in its effect, strengthening the muscles of stomach and bowels so that after a short time these organs regain the power to perform their natural functions without assistance.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is sold by druggists everywhere in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried it, write for a sample to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill.; he will gladly send a trial bottle without any expense to you whatever.

Both Wrong.

A ludicrous story is told of an Edinburg bailie, whose studies in natural history seem to have been limited. The following case came before him one day:

A man who kept a ferret having to go into the country, left the cage with the ferret in charge of a neighbor till he should return. The neighbor incautiously opened the cage door, and the ferret escaped. The owner was very angry, and brought a claim against him for damages.

The following was the decision of the learned bailie: "Nee doot," he said to the neighbor; "nae doot, ye was wrang to open the cage door; but," he added, turning to the owner, "ye was wrang too. Whet for did ye no clip the brute's wings?"

Ready for Anything.

A popular neighbor had just passed to the great beyond in a rural Pennsylvania community and the undertaker stood at the door of the home, when he heard the following remarks by the minister:

"Mine bredren und sisters, Joe Thomas he iss dead. Maybe Joe Thomas he go to heaven up I no know, und maybe Joe Thomas he go to hell down I no know, but, mine bredren und sisters, we must be prepared to meet him."

His Economy.

"What is your idea of economy?" asked one statesman.

"Making everybody except my constituents get along with as little money as possible," replied the other.

Young America's Reply.

"Why did Shylock want a pound of flesh?"

"I suppose he knew that the price of meat was going up."

What we think upon, what we love, we become. As we think great or noble thoughts, we become great or noble.—Bradley.

STUDY, ANYHOW.

"Yes, she had to give up her part."

"Was it a case of overstudy?"

"No; understudy."

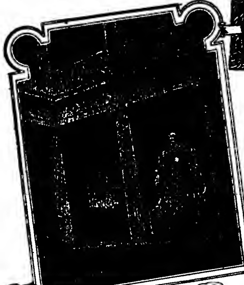
LINCOLN MEMORIALS and STATUES



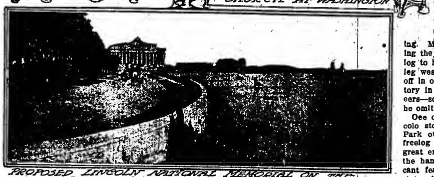
A REPLICA of THE FIGURE of LINCOLN, SEATED, BY ST GAUDENS

THE FAMOUS HEAD of LINCOLN BY ST GAUDENS

STATUE of LINCOLN ERECTED BY THE FREED SLAVES

LINCOLN MASK MADE AFTER DEATH

LINCOLN'S PEW IN HIS CHURCH AT WASHINGTON



PROPOSED LINCOLN NATIONAL MEMORIAL ON THE BANKS of THE POTOMAC RIVER

A GRATEFUL nation has been anything but tardy in affording tangible evidence of its gratitude to the man who as President of the republic guided the Union through the most trying period of its history. Tributes in marble and bronze to Abraham Lincoln are to be found in all parts of the United States, and additions to the list are constantly being made. Latterly there has been a disposition on the part of our public men and influential citizens to devise in recognition of the services of the Civil War President memorials of even more elaborate and imposing character than the statues that have been erected in so many of the states that he labored to keep under one flag.

A recent notable instance of this trend was found in the provision of an impressive memorial structure on the famous "Lincoln farm" in Kentucky. The erection of this monumental edifice, which was dedicated by President Taft only a few months ago, represents but one phase of an ambitious project to restore and protect the birthplace of Lincoln and the scenes of his early life, making it, as it should be, a patriotic mecca to which great numbers of Lincoln's fellow-countrymen will make pilgrimages just as they do to the home of George Washington at Mount Vernon, and to the home and tomb of Thomas Jefferson at Charlottesville, Virginia.

Even more pretentious is the project now before congress for a $2,000,000 memorial to Lincoln that shall be in the fullest sense a tribute from the reunited nation. Visitors to the seat of government in recent years have often expressed wonder that whereas there are in Washington appropriate testimonials to the Father of His Country and other national idols, there has been no memorial commensurate with the commanding place which Lincoln has occupied in the history of the country. The government has not been unconscious of this lack, but merely deferred action until such time as there could be provided a tribute worthy of the great man who inspired it. This is now assured, owing to the liberal sum that will be expended in this labor of love.

From the time it was decided that the occasion had arrived for congress to take definite action with reference to a national Lincoln memorial there has been discussion and difference of opinion as to the form which this acknowledgment of the nation's gratitude should take. Most of the men having voice in the matter seem to have come to the conclusion that the ideal memorial will be a massive monumental structure—a sort of temple of fame to be built of white marble on the banks of the Potomac at Washington and adorned with statues of Lincoln and representations of persons and events conspicuously identified with his career. The effect would be, of course, to create a companion patriotic shrine to that at George Washington's Mount Vernon estate a few miles farther down the same river.

However, many persons of prominence have all along argued in favor of other forms of memorial. A memorial bridge between the national capital and the national cemetery at Arlington beyond the Potomac has repeatedly been suggested and so has a memorial arch, but probably sentiment has been strongest for a Lincoln memorial boulevard or highway. The proposal has been to construct this highway as a connecting link between the national capital and the battlefield at Gettysburg where Lincoln delivered his immortal speech. The chief objection to this scheme is that the highway could be used and enjoyed only by people who had automobiles or other vehicles of their own or the means to hire such conveyances.

While on the subject of these elaborate Lincoln memorials it may be noted that first place in this category belongs, of course, to the Lincoln tomb at Springfield, Illinois. The monument to Lincoln at Springfield, alike to the monuments to our other martyr presidents—Garfield and McKinley—is not merely public but national. For the Lincoln monument the sum of $200,000 was collected. Of this sum $28,000 came from the soldiers of the Civil war, and $8,000 of this amount was contributed by the negro troops out of the first money they ever earned. The Lincoln monument has had to be reconstructed several times and entirely rebuilt once, owing to the character of the foundation, and these circumstances necessitated the removal of Lincoln's body, which, all told, has been moved some ten or twelve times since the original burial.

Certainly one of the most commendable of all the existing memorials to Lincoln is the Lincoln Memorial University of Claiborne county, Tennessee, which was founded by Gen. O. O. Howard, one of the most devoted of Lincoln's admirers, and the object of which is to benefit the people from whom Lincoln sprang, the mountaineers of the Cumberland Gap region. The grounds of the university contain six hundred acres and there are several buildings upon them, although more are needed. The university was chartered by the State of Tennessee on Lincoln's birthday in 1897 and has already performed a tremendous service for the people of an isolated region which may be said to offer no other similar educational advantages. It has been claimed that owing to the handicap which Lincoln himself sustained in early life, owing to ignorance and poverty, he would, if he could choose, probably prefer this memorial in the Tennessee mountains to any other that could be reared to his memory.

Of the numerous statues of Lincoln which have place in cities and towns all over the United States the most notable, from an artistic standpoint, are two executed by the late Augustus St. Gaudens, America's greatest sculptor. Both of these statues are figures of heroic size. One which represents Lincoln standing has been erected in Lincoln Park in the city of Chicago, whereas the other, which shows Lincoln seated, was a gift to the South Side of Chicago by bequest of the late John Crerar of that city. The St. Gaudens head of Lincoln was selected by the national government for reproduction on the Lincoln commemorative postage stamp, which was issued by the Post Office Department a year or so ago.

The work of the sculptors who are called upon to reproduce the features of Lincoln in marble or bronze is greatly facilitated by the fact that there are in existence excellent life and death masks which faithfully portray the countenance of the kindly ruler at the time he first took office and at various periods up to his death. The making of the life mask of Lincoln was, by the way, a rather trying ordeal for the president, who was obliged to sit for an hour with the plaster covering his face, but not interfering with his eyesight or breathing. Mr. Lincoln himself assisted in removing the mask, a particularly difficult task owing to his high cheekbones, but the undertaking was entirely successful, the mask coming off in one piece and being especially satisfactory in that it included the impress of both ears—something that in many instances must be omitted in the securance of a life mask.

One of the most interesting of all the Lincoln statues is the bronze figure in Lincoln Park at Washington, which shows Lincoln freeing the slave—an emblematic figure of the great emancipator striking the shackles from the hands of a kneeling negro. The significant feature in connection with this unique statue is that it was erected by money contributed through popular subscription by the freed slaves. Another interesting memorial to Lincoln at the capital he saved is found in a simple silver plate on the pew which he always occupied in the church, a few blocks from the White House, of which he was a member. Congress has paid $30,000 for the house in which Lincoln died, and will, in all probability, in time convert it into a Lincoln Memorial Museum under governmental auspices. This will involve the expenditure of considerable money, because the building is now closely hemmed in by other buildings which ought to be torn down in order to properly safeguard the historic building against fire.

The city of New York, which has notable memorials to so many of the nation's heroes, is deficient in testimonials to Lincoln, but this lack is soon to be remedied if the project launched by Joseph H. Choate and other prominent New Yorkers meets with success. This contemplates the erection in the metropolis of some fitting memorial, possibly a magnificent arch such as the Arch of Triumph, which is one of the chief glories of Paris. A very appropriate form of Lincoln memorial is the present task of placing in all our national cemeteries bronze tablets bearing Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Ultimately these tablets will be placed also in great numbers of schools, public buildings, etc.

STEEPLEJACK CLIMBS HIGH

Goes to the Top of Tall Flagstaff in Zero Weather and Straightens Rod Supporting Ball.

Chicago.—Edmond Von Kaenel, steeplejack, the other afternoon climbed the flagstaff on the city hall with the aid of a double-looped five-eighths inch rope, straightened the rod which supports the twenty-two inch ball and descended, sixty-five feet to the roof, in safety. "It's ten degrees colder on top of that flagstaff than down here," said Von Kaenel as he coiled up his ropes. That meant that the temperature on the city hall top was four degrees below zero. The halyards of the flag pole had become bent so that the brass ball on top leaned far to one side. Von Kaenel has been married two years. His wife is with him. He says that she has become used to his risking his life and does not mind his tasks any longer. It is impossible for the steeplejack to get insurance, but he was insured in one company in his boyhood, and the policy holds good. If all the buildings and flagstaffs he has climbed were to be put together they would reach seventy miles in the air. Von Kaenel ran away to sea at fifteen and has been climbing masts and poles ever since. "I can go all over the Singer building in New York with a truckful of ropes, 2,800 feet," he declared, "and never employ a scaffold." The only fall that Von Kaenel has ever had was last summer, when, overheated, he fell from the roof of the Euclid Avenue Baptist church in Cleveland, John D. Rockefeller's church.

PRINCESS MAY MARRY SOON

Emperor's Daughter Reported Engaged to Grand Duke Albert Frederick of Mecklenberg-Strelitz.

Berlin.—The betrothal of Princess Victoria Luise, only daughter of Emperor William, to Grand Duke Adolph Frederick of Mecklenburg-Strelitz will soon be announced, according to a report published here. The marshal of the imperial court denied a similar report published last June.

The kaiser has always said his daughter should marry the man of her choice.

The grand duke is one of the best known of the younger German explorers. He distinguished himself in 1908 by helping rescue several of a party he had led to the crater of Bronca in German East Africa. All were showered with lava, and some became unconscious.

Plans "Bean Pole" Building.

New York.—Samuel Green has filed plans for the erection of "the Bean Pole" building, which is to cost $150,000. It will be eighteen stories high, on a tiny lot, which gave rise to its name. The Wendels, who keep a $2,000,000 lot near Fifth avenue and Third street for a playground for a pet dog, filed plans for a $12,000 brick spite fence to be built alongside a property which is only worth $12,000, according to the tax assessors.

A NEW LINCOLN STORY

Senator Teller Relates Anecdote of First Campaign for the Presidency.

Senator Teller of Colorado tells a Lincoln story which he says has never been printed and which in many ways is unique in its interest. None of the students of Lincolniana about Washington remembered the story, and the fact that it could have escaped publication all these years is regarded as remarkable, says the New York Herald's Washington correspondent. It is going the rounds of the capital and causing many laughs.

Henry M. Teller was a young man in the year 1860, when Lincoln was nominated for president. He lived in Illinois and had been drawn into rather close relation with Lincoln. So when the presidential campaign came on this young man was selected to go up to Chicago and assist in the business of receiving delegates, talking Lincoln to them and generally managing the game.

Young Teller got on handsomely and the prospect for Lincoln began to look better to him. The candidates, of course, were all decorously keeping away from the convention city. It would be exceedingly bad form for one of them to appear near the convention. What was the consternation, then, in the Lincoln camp when it was reported one afternoon that "Old Abe" had been seen in town and that he was calling on his Chicago friends and swapping stories about everything except the presidency.

Lincoln must be hustled out of town. It would be ruinous to have it known that he had been in Chicago. Teller was sent to eject him. He found the presidential candidate at a hotel, enjoying himself watching the crowds. Mr. Teller explained his mission, delicately as possible, but very firmly. Mr. Lincoln protested that he didn't have any chance worth bothering about. Mr. Teller insisted that there was an excellent chance, and that the proprieties would have to be observed in these little matters. The New England people were punctilious about such affairs of form. At last Mr. Lincoln yielded.

"I'll go," he said. "I'll do it because I believe you fellows are right. Any convention that got a good look at me couldn't be expected to nominate me, could it? I'll have a better chance if they don't even find out what I look like."

And at midnight, without half a dozen of the politicians knowing he had been in town, aside from his Illinois friends, he was put on the train and started back to Springfield. Three days later he was the nominee of the Republican party for the presidency. Mr. Lincoln regarded himself as the homeliest man in the country and once told a friend that it was getting the votes of the people who were thankful for not being homely that elected him.

Lincoln's "Way To Do It."

A new story on Lincoln emanates from the navy department; but the great emancipator's "way to do it" in this case would be rather dangerous for general adoption.

Early in the war a naval captain decided to enter the Confederate service. His wife pleaded with him to remain with the Union, not only because of loyalty but because it meant the support of his family. But the resignation was dispatched to the department at Washington, and the wife, left alone with her little family, decided that she would go to the capitol and would herself see if something could not be done.

At the navy department she told her story, but the officials said that she was quite too late, because the resignation had been accepted. Finally the secretary, touched by her appeal, suggested that there was one person in the country who might do something for her—that was President Lincoln.

With her luncheon basket on her arm and with her little tots tugging at her skirts, she made her way to the White House. She found the president, and he, having heard her story, at once sent over for the secretary of the navy, that he might see the papers in the case. The secretary, who was himself won to the cause, presented the facts. As Lincoln looked at the anxious little wife, he asked:

"Mr. Secretary, is there no way that this can be arranged?"

"I know of no possible way, Mr. President."

"Let me see the resignation."

It was handed to him. He examined the document carefully and then deliberately tore it across and into shreds. "This," he said, turning to the secretary and to the little mother, "this is one way to do it."

Thus the officer remained with the Union because of his wife and the president, and the service record of this southern captain is among the brightest in the annals of our naval history.—"Affairs at Washington," by Joe Mitchell Chapple, in National Magazine.

Wager Cost Life.

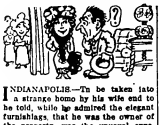
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

New Home Secretly Furnished by Wife



INDIANAPOLIS.—To be taken into a strange home by his wife and to be told, while he admired the elegant furnishings, that he was the owner of the property, was the unusual experience the other afternoon of John E. Keller, manager of a department in a local store. Until then Mr. and Mrs. Keller resided in the Meridian flats. They now reside at 2535 Talbott avenue in a home that was chosen by Mrs. Keller and completely furnished by her without her husband's knowledge.

The clever deception used by Mrs. Keller to keep her husband ignorant of her plans to surprise him would have baffled a detective even if he had been suspicious of her intentions. The culmination of her plans so startled Mr. Keller that he declared that he felt his "brain was fuzzy."

"A short time ago," said Mr. Keller, "we decided to give up our apartment at the Meridian flats and to place our furnishings in storage that we might engage a smaller apartment. I came home one night from the store and a part of the furniture was gone. My wife informed me that she had stored the furniture in 'the nicest little place imaginable.'

"The next evening when I returned more of the furniture had been taken away and I thought nothing of it, as my wife semed to have taken the moving of our property in charge. The following afternoon she suggested that I walk with her to Talbott avenue to inspect a home that was for rent.

"She told me to wait and that she would call at a neighbor's house for the key. When she got the key the whole family came to the porch and smiled at me. Not understanding the situation at the time I thought they acted strangely, but said nothing about it.

"I put the key in the lock, opened the door and was surprised to see that the house was furnished.

"Moving day had occurred in the experience of at least one married man without his knowing anything about it."

The change of residence made by Mr. and Mrs. Keller was on their ninth wedding anniversary.

Jilts Philosopher for Man With Money

WELL WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THAT ?
MARRIAGE LICENSE

PHILADELPHIA.—Guy Carlton Lee, widely known throughout the country as a lecturer and a philosopher, sat in the St. James hotel the other day contemplating a marriage license which he had procured, thinking he was to marry Dr. Hildegarde H. Langsdorf of Carlisle, Pa.

He was taking one last look at the marriage license prior to returning it to the bureau with the notation: "Not used. She married another."

Dr. Langsdorf became the bride of John L. Ayer of Chester, Pa., a wealthy young man who doesn't have to do anything but spend his money. They were married the day before at Media after a race between the two men for the hand of the bride.

In his downcast way Lee told all about it. He said he had lost and he felt grieved.

"I love Dr. Langsdorf, dearly," he said, "and I thought she was going to marry me. She seemed to doubt it, but I wouldn't take no for an answer.

"I came to Philadelphia with the understanding that Dr. Langsdorf would follow me. She did. I went to the marriage license office and obtained the license. Then I met her at the train and showed it to her. She didn't say much, but I didn't see her again."

After leaving Lee, Dr. Langsdorf went directly to Chester, where she met John L. Ayer. They went to Media and got the marriage license and later married. They did not take their friends into their confidence and no person seems to know where they have gone.

Old Man Gives Pointers on Skating

DETROIT.—For the first time in 46 years, Charles Thompson, a California fruit grower, aged 72 years, put on a pair of skates a few days ago, and caused the crowd of youngsters at the Hamtramck skating rink to gasp in wonder and astonishment at his performance.

Thompson, who lived in Detroit before the Civil war, is visiting relatives in Hamtramck, near the Heilbrook school. In search of diversion, and in an attempt to discover a few of the old landmarks of their boyhood, he and his host started for a walk. About the first thing they encountered was the municipal skating rink, crowded with small boys.

"I believe that I am not too old yet to go in for that," said Thompson, stroking his flowing beard.

"Shouldn't wonder if you weren't, Charlie. Like to see you try it," said his companion.

A pair of skates were produced and Thompson put them on. He rose shakily to his feet, his knees trembling. A small boy skated up, and proffered assistance.

"Come on, Mister, I'll help you start. There! Steady now! Stroke, mistar; right-left—now you're going. Gee, stroke slower; don't go so fast, you'll fall. Hey! Where are you going, anyway. I can't keep up to you. Leggo! Leggo, I say." And the small boy was left behind, gazing in astonishment at the figure eights and the "Dutch rolls" which the old man with the flowing beard cut.

"I can't go like I used to," he said. "My knees are a trifle wobbly and my ankles are getin' weak for this kind of sport."

Thompson owns a large farm at Farmersville, Cal.

With 1,283 Letters He Finds Brother

I'LL WRITE A MILLION LETTERS BEFORE I GIVE UP—!

MINNEAPOLIS.—To meet his brother, whom he had never seen, in order to find whom he had written 1,283 letters, addressing every man named Lundy that he learned of anywhere in the world, C. A. Lundy, 4341 Twelfth avenue S., left the other day for Ferryville, Wis., where he will spend some time.

Twenty-five years ago John Lundy and wife and the little boy, who is now C. A. Lundy, 31 years old, came from near Bergen, Norway, and settled near Lanesboro, Filmore county, Minnesota. There Mrs. Lundy died shortly after.

John Lundy married again, after a time. C. A. Lundy went to live with another family who brought him up. Martin Lundy came into the world. John Lundy died and his widow married again and became Mrs. E. Anderson. C. A. Lundy knew there had been a little child born to his father and stepmother, but his stepmother had left Minnesota and had married somewhere out of the state and he neither knew where or what her name had become after her second marriage. Martin Lundy is now 20 years of age.

Week after week Mr. Lundy took his letters to the postoffice, and week after week he opened replies, but from nowhere did he learn of a Lundy that was his brother until after a number of years. Then he heard of the Ferryville man, wrote and found his brother. He ceased writing letters thereafter and has been waiting several years for an opportunity to go to Ferryville and greet his brother in person, which opportunity came today.

Mr. Lundy may spend some time in Ferryville before returning to Minneapolis.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

BADEN-POWELL IN AMERICA

Sir Robert Baden-Powell, founder and chief scout of the British Boy Scouts, who arrived in New York a few days ago to visit the Boy Scouts of America, is one of the British heroes of the Boer war, having earned his fame by his brilliant defense of Mafeking.

In fact the history of Baden-Powell's life is packed with incidents of daring. When only nineteen he entered the army, being appointed a sublieutenant of the 13th Hussars, a crack cavalry regiment and being sent to India.

From India he was sent to South Africa and participated in the Zululand operations in 1888. From there he went to Malta for three years and in 1896 he was ordered to Mafeking and from there made many scouting expeditions to various parts of the country.

Among his feats that stand out in the course of the defense of Mafeking was the engagement on May 12, 1900, when the Boer besiegers, knowing that relief was on the way to the garrison, made their final desperate attempt to storm the town.

BREAKS AN AVIATION RECORD

All American records for the carrying of passengers in a heavier than air machine were smashed the other day, when George W. Beatty, operating a biplane, carried three persons with him in the air above the Nassau Boulevard Aviation field, New York, and flew over Belmont Park, Garden City and Mineola for fifteen minutes. The wind beat against the sides of the fragile machine, rocking it dangerously, and the cold was intense, but Beatty did not come to earth until he was confident he had done more in one branch of aviation than has any other man in this country. A smooth, graceful descent to earth marked the finish of the trip.

It was said by several men who saw the flight that Beatty flew with his three passengers more than sixteen miles. Leo Stevens, an aviator, placed the distance, however, at approximately ten miles, saying no man could fly with a burden of three passengers further than that in the time passed by Beatty in the air under the existing conditions.

After the flight Beatty, when speaking to a reporter, said he had marked the actual time passed in the air as twelve minutes and the distance covered as approximately eight miles. He could not be sure of the number of miles, he said, as all his attention had been attracted to guiding the machine.

BISHOP OF ALASKA RETURNS

Church bazaars have proved a success in a land where churches, except of the most primitive kind, are unknown.

Right Rev. Peter Kimball Rowe, Bishop of Alaska, who arrived in Chicago recently, received a wireless telegram while en route telling of the success of a bazaar held within the shadow of the artic circle.

The message read: "Camp Iditarod, Alaska—Bazaar just finished, Receipts, $1,782. Temperature, 72 degrees below."

Bishop Rowe came from Alaska for the express purpose of making a plea for the Indians to President Taft. He spent several days in Washington and says he is well pleased with the result of his mission.

For sixteen years he has been tramping the snow fields of Alaska, ministering to white man and Indian alike.

"To preach the gospel in Alaska one must train for the task," said Bishop Rowe after he had been prevailed upon to relate some of his experiences. "Before I start out on one of my trips to visit the missions I go into training around the home camp.

NEW MINISTER TO PORTUGAL

Cyrus E. Woods of Greensburg, Pa., will be nominated for the office of United States Minister to Portugal, according to announcement made by Secretary of State Knox the other day. Mr. Woods will succeed Edwin V. Morgan, who has been promoted to be ambassador to Brazil. Senators Penrose and Oliver endorsed Mr. Woods for a diplomatic post, and Secretary Knox was quite willing to make the appointment. At first Mr. Woods was considered for the vacant embassy at Rio de Janeiro, but there were reasons why it was considered best to send a man of experience to that post and consequently Mr. Morgan was chosen and Mr. Woods appointed to his place. The salary of minister to Portugal is $10,000, and the place is considered a very desirable one.

Mr. Woods served in the Pennsylvania legislature from 1901 to 1908 and part of that time was president pro tempore of the state senate. He is now general counsel for the Pittsburg Coal company. His nomination prob-

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Nun Is "Modiste" to Society Belles

YOU COULDN'T HAVE PLEASED ME MORE
I AM SO GLAD YOU ARE PLEASED WITH IT

WASHINGTON.—Silks and satins of a world renounced are made in turn to pay their tribute to the church by Sister Clara, the "Mlle. Modiste" of the convent.

Day long she sits in St. Rose's Industrial school, where many women of wealth and culture known in official and diplomatic Washington circles come to be fitted with gowns which rival those of a Paquin and which are the product of Sister Clara's creative genius.

No fashionable atelier can boast of a more distinguished patronage than can the little room where Sister Clara meets her clients.

The wife and daughters of President Roosevelt wore gowns of her design when they lived in the White House, and the list now includes society dames such as Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Martha Eichborn Pearsall, Mrs. Townsend and her daughter Mathilde, who is now the wife of Peter Goelet Garry.

Sister Clara was once a leader in the cultured circles of a big eastern city, supposed to be New York. She is the child of wealthy parents, reared in luxury and convent bred. When she was graduated she became one of the best known of the younger set in her home city.

But society life did not charm her, and the years of her convent life reasserted themselves and she became a novice. Being a girl of superior tastes, she chose St. Rose's Industrial school as the place for her life work.

How Two Department Heads Compromised

DR. WILEY, the pure fooder, and Willis L. Moore, the boss weatherman, are great cronies. They are drawn together by the fact that each is a daily victim of amateur jesters and sidewalk merry-makers who persist in cracking the same old jokes about the weather or things to eat.

Wiley and Moore were talking to a couple of friends the other day and somebody suggested a dinner. Wiley said he would be in for it, and Moore said he would. So it was arranged that the dinner should be held at the Cosmos club the next night.

When the guests arrived, Moore, believing himself the host, indicated the way to a table where the feast he had ordered was to be spread.

"But the dinner's to be served at this table over here," said Wiley, pointing to another end of the dining room.

"Well, who's running this, anyhow?" inquired Moore. "I guess I'm the host."

"I beg your pardon," said Wiley, "but I happen to be the host, and—"

There it was. Each had thought himself the host and ordered an elaborate and highly edible layout of stuff in advance.

Wiley's food scheme included milk-fed chickens, hatched from a Strictly Fresh egg, and Moore had arranged for a beefsteak the size of a doormat and as thick as a law book. The two hosts stood midway between the two tables and argued about the merits of the rival feasts with all the imaginative words picturings of a pair of press agents. After each had failed to convince the other, Wiley suggested a compromise. It was a compromise characteristic of Wiley, who has one of those shaft-driven, internal expanding appetites.

"I'll admit that your table is in the best location," began the doctor, "so we'll move my costly feast over to your table, and we'll eat both dinners!"

Military Guard Urged for White House

THE question of a military guard for the White House is occasioning much discussion, both among people who think soldiers should be detailed there and among others who oppose that plan. Adherents to the plan for a military guard had to combat the objection of others that this would be undemocratic, but they pointed out that the president of practically every republic in the world is guarded against danger by soldiers. It would not be necessary to have such a large force of soldiery as to lend too much of a military air to the White House, it was pointed out. Col. John McElroy, a prominent G. A. R. man, proposed that the president's guard be selected from among honorably discharged soldiers. Such a plan, he said, not only would lend proper dignity to the White House, but would tend to provide rewards for men who have served the nation creditably in war.

"I can think of no greater inducement which could be offered to men to enter the army than the thought that some day they might be detailed in Washington as a guard of honor to the president of the republic," said Colonel McElroy. "It would be a splendid idea. Many of the nations of Europe have such a plan, and it always has worked admirably. This is a work for retired soldiers who have not outlived their usefulness, which should be advocated by all patriotic persons. It would be excellent to have men in soldier uniform guarding both the inside and the outside of the executive mansion.

With the continued growth of the city, it is said, all policemen will have to be recalled from detail work, or the force will have to be increased. Should the military guard be established, they argue, the country would not be put to any additional expense, the presence of the soldiers at the White House would add to the dignity of the place, and the Washington police force would be made more efficient.

Navy in Fight for a Wooden Indian

THE authorities of the state of Delaware have communicated to the navy department a request that the wooden statue of Tecumseh, Indian chief, which formed the figurehead of the old ship of the line Delaware, be turned over to them, but the officers who have graduated from the naval academy, where the figure of the old brave is now, are not likely to permit its removal without vigorous protest.

Not only is the feeling general that the naval academy is the proper location for as many of the relics of the old navy as can be secured, but the peculiar position of old Tecumseh in the traditions of the academy make its removal almost out of the question.

Brought to Annapolis shortly after the return of the academy from Newport, to which it was transferred during the Civil war, and set up in a prominent place between the old seamanship building and the department of ordnance and gunnery, the midshipmen almost at once [illegible] the statue to the position of an idol, and dubbed it "The God of 2.5," the figure being that which it is necessary to obtain in order to pass an examination at the academy.

The authorities of the academy are now securing data about the history of Tecumseh, the means by which it reached the academy and the place it occupies in the tradition of the institution. There is no doubt that when it becomes generally known in the navy that a move is on foot to tear the old god of a passing mark from the surroundings in which it has become a tradition, a protest will reach the department which will make it impossible to remove it to a less familiar location.

STRIVING FOR EFFECT.

It is pitiful to watch the struggles of those who in their worldly lives try to be what they are not. To gradually pass from a poor condition of life into a better one is vastly different from rushing from one extreme to the other, and the spectacle of striving to keep up too high a pace is one of the most unedifying it is possible to observe, says the Charleston News and Courier. We gain nothing by such conduct unless perhaps it is the applause of those whose favor we may try to cultivate, but even then it often happens that those who praise are also our severest critics. It would seem that we strike the keynote of a happy life when we play our parts naturally, not as gaily attired puppets who dance and twirl for the amusement of others, but as sober-hearted, true-souled men and women who are content to be what they are and who only move across the stage of life for some good purpose. The only effects that are worth striving for are those that come to us naturally or by virtue of our best efforts in a worthy cause. They outlast all those other effects upon which we expend so much time and labor and which are at best merely artificial. They may not be so wonderful in their color schemes; they may not rush across our vision like birds of brilliant hues that flit across the blue, but they gather radiance with the passing years. Their colors never fade, their results last forever and they linger long in the memory of those who are so fortunate as to have beheld their beautiful vision.

There can be no two opinions on the proposition that China sorely needs a new language to replace the many and widely varying dialects that now serve to divide, rather than to unite her people. English, the language of trade and diplomacy in the east, is the most available. Educated Chinese, natural linguists that they are, have found little difficulty in mastering it. But how about the mass of the population? Will they find it just as easy? The day may come when English will be spoken quite generally in China, but that day is still far away. Presidential decrees may hasten its coming a little, if they are backed up by educational provisions. But in spite of all that can be done to promote it the change must necessarily be of very slow growth. The men who are taking this occasion to put forth the plan might more properly be called dreamers than progressives.

It is a curious fact that in the mildest winter on record the price of fresh eggs in New York should have mounted to an unprecedented height. But there's a reason—at least there is said to be. The cold storage men, it is stated, have in stock no fewer than three hundred million dozen eggs, some of which they have held for a long time. They are afraid of carrying this stock indefinitely in the present attitude of legislators toward cold storage. Therefore they are holding fresh eggs out of the market practically by putting a prohibitory price upon them, and thus creating a condition in which many people will buy "seconds" at figures that they would regard as extortionate at any other time. It's a great game—from the standpoint of shrewd business, not from the standpoint of fair dealing.

If buckwheat coal, which until a comparatively few years ago was thrown upon the culm banks of the anthracite mines as worthless, is to be boosted in price, as reported, it means just that much more clear profit to the producing companies and operators. From an economic standpoint the utilization of what was once a waste product is a good thing for both the public and the producers, as it tends to prolong the life of the anthracite regions, but it is hard to see what justification there can be in existing conditions for an advance in price. Doubtless the big companies, whose dividends range from 20 per cent. down to 6, need the money, and what more need be said?

Emotional women seldom bring hothouse flowers to the commonplace criminal who is in prison for stealing a cow or picking a pocket. These choice gifts are reserved for the higher class offender who commits a revolting murder.

The Chinese have been doing more fighting than straw braiding, and straw hats next summer may be high priced. No one, however, in midwinter cares about what is to happen in midsummer

KNOCKED OUT COLD!

33 ARE INDICTED

GRAND JURY AT INDIANAPOLIS BRING IN TRUE BILLS IN DYNAMITE OUTRAGES.

MANY LABOR LEADERS HIT

Names of Accused Men Are Suppressed Until Arrests Are Made—Ortie McManigal's Story of Conspiracy Is Basis for Indictments.

Indianapolis.—Thirty-three indictments were returned before Judge Anderson by the federal grand jury which has been investigating the dynamite outrages of the past six years.

Summonses are being prepared for the arrest of forty or fifty labor leaders scattered throughout eighteen states.

The courtroom was packed when Foreman Glessbrenner of the grand jury lugged the indictments in from the jury room in two bulging suit cases. The names of those indicted were ordered suppressed. The number of indictments does not indicate the number of men indicted, as many are charged with the same offense in blanket indictments. It is known that the history of the McNamaras has been traced from the time they exploded their first bomb, and practically every person connected with them in transporting dynamite, who paid them for their crimes or had knowledge of their operations, has been indicted.

March 12 was set as arraignment day and clerks began the work of making certified copies of the indictment and preparing summonses. An effort will be made to arrest every man named at the same hour and nearly every defendant is now known to be under surveillance in different parts of the country.

Many of the indictments center around the activities of Ortie McManigal, confessed dynamiter, and those who went to Detroit in June, 1907, and induced him to become a member of the rawing band have been indicted.

Milwaukee, Chicago, New York, Boston, Cleveland, Peoria, San Francisco, Kansas City, Omaha, Pittsburgh, New Orleans, Buffalo, Detroit, Philadelphia, Indianapolis and St. Louis are among the cities in which arrests are expected, although the government has been making an especial effort to keep secret the names of the men involved.

GEN. JAMES B. WEAVER DEAD

Former Congressman and Twice Nominee for President Succumbs to Heart Failure at Des Moines.

Des Moines, Ia.—Gen. James B. Weaver, veteran of the Civil war, former member of congress, twice nominee for the office of president of the United States and pioneer of political reform, is dead at the age of seventy-nine years.

Death was due to heart failure following an attack of acute indigestion.

COURT RULES AGAINST LEWIS

Overrules Demurrer to Indictment of Banker Accused of Misuse of the Mails.

St. Louis.—Judge Amidon, in the federal court, overruled a demurrer to the indictment against E. G. Lewis, accused of misuse of the mails in connection with the People's United States bank. Shepard Barclay, attorney for Lewis, contended that the grand jury which returned the bill was not properly constituted.

Wrecked; Row 300 Miles.

Victoria, B. C.—The first mate and nine men of the crew of the Norwegian ship Askoy, which was wrecked December 27 on Elizabeth reef, rowed 300 miles in an open boat to the Australian coast, according to news brought here by the steamer Marama.

Paris.—As a result of M. Lepine's new regulations against the throwing down of handbills in the street, the appearance of the city is cleaner than it has been for years.

BANDITS LOOT TRAIN

FIVE MEN HOLD UP ROCK ISLAND PASSENGER.

Mail and Express Cars Are Cut From Coaches Near Hurlburt, Ky., and $75,000 Secured.

Memphis, Tenn.—Five train robbers looted the mail and express cars of the Rock Island train No. 43, near Hurlburt, Ark., and got away with from $60,000 to $75,000 consigned to a bank in Oklahoma.

The money was taken from the safe of the Wells-Fargo Express company and the robbers escaped with their booty long before an alarm was spread.

The train left Memphis about midnight. After it cleared the western terminus of the Mississippi river bridge it was boarded by two masked men. They climbed over the tender, covered the engine crew with guns, then the train was halted. The engineer was bound and gagged, then kicked off into a ditch. The fireman ran the train on several miles until it was signaled to a halt at a campfire alongside the track, where three other bandits waited.

The engine with the two cars meanwhile proceeded to a point a mile east of Hurlburt, Ark. Then the robbers ransacked the postal car, blew open the safe in the Wells-Fargo express car, gathered their plunder and made off in the darkness.

ARRANGE A NEW ARMISTICE

Chinese Empress Dowager Makes Various Demands in Interest of Imperial Family.

Peking.—A complete armistice has been arranged, but bargaining between Premier Yuan Shi Kai and the republican leaders is likely to continue for several weeks before the court finally retires.

Chinese papers publish the terms laid down by the empress dowager, which include the perpetuation of the titles of the entire court, retention by the imperial family of the palaces in Peking, continuation of the imperial guard at the expense of the republic, and the right of the court to exact regal homage from the nation. It is believed that the republicans will not accept some of these terms.

STEAMER BURNS, CREW SAVED

Consols, With Valuable Cargo, Destroyed in Hampton Roads and Hull Goes Down.

Norfolk, Va.—The steamer Consols, bound from Galveston to Hamburg with a cargo of cotton and cottonseed cake, and which was being towed towards Hampton Roads in an attempt to save at least part of her cargo after a fire had been raging in her hold for many hours, was burned to the water's edge and sank. The flames leaped to a height of eighty feet. The cargo is very valuable. The crew were rescued and have been landed.

GRAIN OUTPUT IS IMMENSE

Northwestern Elevators to Contain 60,000,000 Bushels in Spring—Amount Is Unprecedented.

Duluth, Minn.—Prospects are that there will be 60,000,000 bushels of grain between the Duluth and Superior and the Port Arthur and Fort William elevators at the opening of navigation next spring. This is said to be unprecedented. Winnipeg estimates that the Canadian grain of the present crop will be sent east via the American head of the lakes for next spring will aggregate about 15,000,000 bushels.

IRISH ONLY HOOT

WINSTON CHURCHILL DEFIES BELFAST RIOTERS AND URGES HOME RULE IN SPEECH.

QUITS BELFAST IN HASTE

Bad Feeling Develops But Meeting Ends Without Violence—Outlines Scope of Government's Bill Providing for Parliament in Ireland.

Belfast, Ireland.—Winston Churchill came here to the heart of the Orangeman's country made an address and left safely for home minus the broken head which his opponents had predicted for him.

The first lord of the admiralty and John E. Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists, spoke from the same platform on the home rule bill. Mr. Churchill outlined the intentions of the government with respect to self-government for Ireland and declared no greater boon could come to the empire than the settlement of the long and bitter quarrel between the British government and the Irish people.

When Mr. Churchill, with his wife, arrived at the Central station his party was given a somewhat mixed reception. A number of Orangemen who had gathered at the station greeted them with groans and boos, but these were drowned in the hearty cheers of the large crowd of Liberals and Nationalists.

The presence in Belfast of the largest military force ever gathered to preserve peace among the Irish factions and a drenching rain combined to check the bellicose ardor of the anti-home rulers, whose hostility was vented mainly by booing and hooting.

But that ugly temper was aroused and that the civic authorities were alarmed by possible consequences is shown by the fact that, on their advice, Mr. Churchill left the city by a special train two hours before the announced time of his departure, thus disappointing a huge crowd which assembled later to give him a mixed send-off.

Mr. Churchill's speech was delivered before an audience from which every effort had been made to bar all hostile elements. It aroused tremendous enthusiasm, but at one point a group of suffragettes attempted to cause a disturbance, and several of them were ejected.

The essential feature of the Liberal government's home rule bill to be introduced into the British parliament were set forth by Mr. Churchill.

The bill is to contain provisions for a fair representation in the two houses of the Irish parliament of all classes of the Irish people and restrictions will be placed on the passing of laws or the imposition of taxes which might be unjust to any party, while religious freedom is to be secured.

The armed forces in Ireland are to be controlled by the imperial government, but Ireland is to control its own finances, while the imperial government will continue its land purchase and pensions schemes.

SAYS HINES OFFERED BRIBE

Girl Asserts Chicago Lumberman Desired to Read Detective's Message—Swears He Had Money.

Washington.—A direct charge of attempted bribery was made against Edward Hines, the Chicago lumberman, whose efforts in behalf of Senator Lorimer have figured all through the testimony, here by Miss Helen Seavers, telegraph operator in a local hotel, when she took the witness stand before the senatorial investigation committee.

Miss Seevers swore that Hines offered her money about two weeks ago if she would permit him to examine a message that Detective Bailey had just sent to H. E. Kerr of Detroit. Bailey is the Burns operative who swore that Charles McGowan had admitted he perjured himself when he testified in behalf of Lorimer, and Kerr is the Detroit business man who was present at one of the conversations between McGowan and the detective.

"Mr. Hines said he would 'put something in my paw' if I would let him see the message," Miss Seevers testified. "He came back later and I saw money in his hand. I told him it was against the rules of the company to show messages to anyone except the sender, and I also informed him that I could not be bribed to do wrong."

The bribery charge came on the heels of McGowan's denial that he "stuck up" the Hines people for $5,000. According to McGowan, it was extremely difficult to obtain money from Hines' crowd. Miss Seevers, therefore, caused a surprise when she declared that money was being carried around a hotel lobby by the Chicago lumberman.

SAYS TRUST IS CRUEL

INVESTIGATOR CHARGES STEEL COMPANY FLOGS CONVICTS.

Declares Men Are Stripped and Unmercifully Whipped When They Fail of Their Tasks.

Washington.—S. M. Harrison, a magazine writer, caused a sensation before the senate finance committee at a hearing on steel tariff revision here. He said the United States Steel corporation was to blame for flogging of convicts in labor camps in Alabama.

He said he had seen a prisoner flogged with a three-ply leather strap and had seen black and blue marks on one convict's back. Failure to do the required tasks was punishable by flogging, solitary confinement and by other methods, he said.

He said convict laborers were forced to lie flat on their faces to be flogged.

"Flogged with a thong as big as a wagon trace or tug?" suggested Mr Stanley.

"By a strap five feet long."

"Ever see this instrument of torture?"

"Yes."

"What's the usual punishment?"

"Fifteen lashes."

Representative Sertlett of Georgia, a member of the committee observed that the whole system of convict labor was wrong.

"I don't think there is any difference in committee as to that," added Representative Gardner of Massachusetts.

"No difference of opinion as to that with us," interjected Attorney Reed for the Steel corporation, "and we are getting out of it as soon as possible."

MEXICAN REVOLT IS FEARED

Loyalty of Gen. Orozco Is Questioned—United States Prepared to Act in Emergency.

Washington.—Another uprising in Mexico is impending, according to official dispatches which cast grave doubts on the loyalty of General Orozco to President Madero and intimate that Orozco is about to begin a new rebellion and declare the independence of the state of Chihuahua.

As Chihuahua borders on Texas, its separation from Mexico would be a matter of deep concern to the United States.

So complete are the military preparations that it is said nothing remains to be done but to send one message to every department army headquarters in the country to insure the prompt assemblage of a sufficient number of troops on the Mexican border to prepare the United States for any emergency that might arise there.

H. W. TAFT'S WIFE CATHOLIC

President's Sister-in-Law Abandons the Protestant Episcopal Faith, According to the Times.

New York.—Mrs. Henry W. Taft, wife of the president's brother, has become a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, says the Times. She renounced the Episcopal faith and was received into the Catholic church last Friday, in the chapel of St. Ignatius Loyola church. Father Vaughan, the English Jesuit priest, who long has been a friend of Mrs. Taft, received her formal confession of faith.

From childhood Mrs. Taft was a devoted member of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mr. Taft and his brother, President Taft, are Unitarians.

GEM FORTUNE IS STOLEN

Thief Gets Away With Two Sample Cases Containing $20,000 Worth of Jewels.

Chicago.—Tired of carrying sample cases filled with gems for jewelry salesmen, a young man, formerly known as a "trusty carrier of jewel-laden grips," decided, it is alleged, to start in business for himself, and walked out of the display room of Spaulding & Co. with more than $20,000 worth of gems.

The jewels are the property of Sloan & Co., New York, and were left in the Spaulding display room by Clement A. Holbrook, salesman.

BILL TO PROTECT EMPLOYES

Measure Introduced in Congress Seeks to Prevent Coercion During Presidential Elections.

Washington.—A bill to prevent any employer of labor from intimidating his employees in presidential elections was introduced in the house by Representative Payser, an Iowa Democrat. The bill makes it unlawful for any employer to post notices or to distribute circulars threatening a reduction in salary or the closing down of any business in the event of the election of a certain presidential ticket.

Brings 90,000 Bushels of Potatoes.

Boston.—The arrival of the steamer Devonian, with her cargo of 90,000 bushels of potatoes, from Liverpool, brings the foreign shipments of the tubers into this port since December 1 to 330,000 bushels.

Fifty Perish in a Snow Drift.

Ishim, Siberia.—A party of fifty persons perished in a snowstorm when along the road in the vicinity of this city. They were caught in a drift from which forty-four bodies have been dug.

Consolation.

Father (to his daughter's suitor)—I have sad news for you. I am ruined! I have lost everything!

Suitor—Console yourself, dear sir, with the thought that you are now in no danger of losing your daughter.

Happy Future.

Apropos of the marriage at Reigate of Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt and Mrs. Hollis McKim, a New York man said on the Olympic: "I met Vanderbilt at the Metropole at Brighton a few days after the ceremony, and I said to him, by way of a joke:

"Well, is the course of true love going to run smooth?"

"'Smooth and straight,' said he. 'There are banks on both sides, you know.'"

Air Laws.

Wilbur Wright, at a tea in Dayton, said with a laugh:

"Already there are air laws, stringent as road laws. Without them we should soon be seeing advertisements like this:

"'Two dollars reward will be paid by Mrs. John Doe for information leading to the identification of the aviator on a Wright roadster who, while flying over my house yesterday afternoon, dropped a can of oil down my chimney and completely ruined a plum pudding I was cooking.'"

Turning the Tables.

Having done his best, by every fair and unfair means, during the last election to catch the candidate tripping, the heckler grew offensively personal.

"Is it true that your mother washee—" he began, but before he could add the word "clothes," the witty candidate called out smartly:

"Of course she does. Why, don't you?"

This raised a loud laugh at the heckler's expense; but, still undaunted, he returned to the attack.

"You can't deny," he said, "that your father was a rag-and-bone man. I bought some clothes of him thirty years ago."

"And I see you're still wearing them!" was the candidate's lightning retort.

There was no more heckling that night.

A TROUBLE MAKER

Coffee Poison Breeds Variety of Ills.

A California woman who didn't know for twenty years what kept her ill, writes to tell how she won back her health by quitting coffee:

"I am 54 years old," she says, "have used coffee all my life, and for 20 years suffered from indigestion and insomnia. Life was a burden and a drag to me all the time, and about once a year my ailments got such hold upon me that I was regularly 'sick in bed' for several weeks each time.

"I was reluctant to conclude that coffee was the cause of my trouble, but I am thankful that I found out the truth.

"Then I determined to use Postum exclusively—for a week at first—for I doubted my ability to do without coffee for any length of time. I made the Postum carefully, as directed, and before the week expired had my reward in a perceptible increase in strength and spirits.

"Seeing the good that my short experiment had accomplished, I resolved to continue the use of Postum, cutting out the coffee entirely. This I did for nine months, finding, daily, increased cause for gratification at my steadily improving health. My indigestion gradually left me, my sleep returned, I gained 26 pounds in weight, my color changed from sallow to a fresh, rosy hue and life became a blessing.

"Then I thought I would try coffee again, and did so for a few weeks. The punishment for deserting my good friend, Postum, was a return of my old troubles.

"That taught me wisdom, and I am now and shall be all my life hereafter using Postum exclusively and enjoying the benefits it brings me." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his 30th birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling.

CHAPTER I.—Continued.

"I still got that hunch." Kearns fingered his cards a long time. "And I'll play it, but you've got to know how I stand. There's my steamer, the Bella—worth twenty thousand if she's worth an ounce. There's Sixty-Mile with five thousand in stock on the shelves. And you know I got a sawmill coming in. It's at Linderman now, and the scow is building. Am I good?"

"Dig in; you're sure good," was Daylight's answer. "And while we're about it, I may mention casual that I got twenty thousand in Mac's safe, there, and there's twenty thousand more in the ground on Moosehide. You know the ground, Campbell. Is they that-all in the dirt?"

"There sure is, Daylight."

"How much does it cost now?" Kearns asked.

"Two thousand to see."

"We'll sure bump you if you-all come in," Daylight warned him.

"It's an almighty good hunch," Kearns said, adding his slip to the growing heap. "I can feel her crawlin' up and down my back."

"I ain't got a hunch, but I got a tolerable good hand," Campbell announced, as he slid in his slip; "but it's not a raising hand."

"Mine is." Daylight paused and wrote. "I see that thousand and raise her the same old thousand."

The Virgin, standing behind him, then did what a man's best friend was not privileged to do. Reaching over Daylight's shoulder, she picked up his hand and read it, at the same time shielding the faces of the cards close to his chest. What she saw were three queens and a pair of eights, but nobody guessed what she saw. Every player's eyes were on her face as she scanned the cards, but no sign did she give. She laid the hand face down again on the table and slowly the lingering eyes withdrew from her, having learned nothing.

MacDonald smiled benevolently. "I see you, Daylight, and I bump this time for two thousand. How's that hunch, Jack?"

"Still a-crawling, Mac. You got me now, but that hunch is a rip-snortar persuadin' sort of a critter, and it's my plain duty to ride it. I call for three thousand. And I got another hunch: Daylight's going to call, too."

"He sure is," Daylight agreed, after Campbell had thrown up his hand. "He knows when he's up against it, and he plays accordin'. I see that two thousand, and then I'll see the draw."

In a dead silence, save for the low voices of the three players, the draw was made. Thirty-four thousand dollars were already in the pot, and the play possibly not half over. To the Virgin's amazement, Daylight held up his three queens, discarding his eights and calling for two cards. And this time not even she dared look at what he had drawn. She knew her limit of control. Nor did he look. The two new cards lay face down on the table where they had been dealt to him.

"Got enough," was the reply.

"You can draw if you want to, you know," Kearns warned him.

"Nope; this'll do me."

Kearns himself drew two cards, but did not look at them. Still Harnish let his cards lie.

"I never bet in the teeth of a pat hand," he said slowly, looking at the saloon keeper. "You-all start her rolling, Mac."

MacDonald counted his cards carefully, to make doubly sure it was not a foul hand, wrote a sum on a paper slip, and slid it into the pot, with the simple utterance:

"Five thousand."

Kearns, with every eye upon him, looked at his two-card draw, counted the other three to dispel any doubt of holding more than five cards, and wrote on a betting slip.

"I see you, Mac," he said, "and I raise her a little thousand just so as to keep Daylight out."

The concentrated gaze shifted to Daylight. He likewise examined his draw and counted his five cards.

"I see that six thousand, and I raise her five thousand . . . just to try and keep you out, Jack."

"And I raise you five thousand just to lend a hand at keeping Jack out," MacDonald said in turn.

His voice was slightly husky and strained, and a nervous twitch in the corner of his mouth followed speech.

Kearns was pale, and those who looked on noted that his hand trembled as he wrote his slip. But his voice was unchanged.

"I lift her along for five thousand," he said.

Daylight was now in the center. The kerosene lamps above flung high lights from the rash of sweat on his forehead. The bronze of his cheeks was darkened by the accession of blood. His black eyes glittered and his nostrils were distended and eager. They were large nostrils, tokening his descent from savage ancestors who had survived by virtue of deep lungs and generous air-passages. Yet, unlike MacDonald, his voice was firm and customary, and, unlike Kearns his hand did not tremble when he wrote.

"I call, for ten thousand," he said. "Not that I'm afraid of you-all, Mac. It's that hunch of Jack's."

"I bump his hunch for five thousand just the same," said MacDonald. "I had the best hand before the draw, and I still guess I got it."

"Mebbe this is a case where a hunch after the draw is better'n the hunch before," Kearns remarked; wherefore duty says, 'Lift her, Jack, lift her,' and so I lift her another five thousand."

Daylight leaned back in his chair and gazed up at the kerosene lamps while he computed aloud:

"I was in nine thousand before the draw, and I saw and raised eleven thousand—that makes thirty. I'm only good for ten more." He leaned forward and looked at Kearns. "So I call er five thousand."

"You can raise if you want," Kearns answered. "Your dogs are good for five thousand in this game."

"Nary dawg. You-all can win my dust and dirt, but nary one of my dawgs. I just call."

The saloon keeper finally spoke:

"If anybody else wins, they'll have to take a mortgage on the Tivoli."

The two other players nodded.

"So I call, too."

MacDonald added his slip for five thousand. Not one of them claimed the pot, and not one of them called the size of his hand. Simultaneously and in silence they faced their cards on the table, while a general tiptoeing and craning of necks took place among the onlookers. Daylight showed four queens and an ace; MacDonald four jacks and an ace, and Kearns four kings and a trey. Kearns reached forward with an encircling movement of his arm and drew the pot in to him, his arm shaking as he did so. Daylight picked the ace from his hand and tossed it over alongside MacDonald's ace, saying:

"That's what cheered me along, Mac. I knowed it was only kings that could beat me, and he had them.

"What did you-all have?" he asked, all interest, turning to Campbell.

"Straight flush of four, open at both ends—a good drawing hand."

"You bet! You could a' made a straight, a straight flush or a flush out of it."

"That's what I thought," Campbell said, sadly. "It cost me six thousand before I quit."

"I wisht you-all'd drawn," Daylight laughed. "Then I wouldn't a' caught that fourth queen. Now I've got to take Billy Rawlins' mail contract and mush for Dyea. What's the size of the killing, Jack?"

Kearns attempted to count the pot, but was too excited. Daylight drew it across to him, with firm fingers separating and stacking the markers and I. O. U.'s and with clear brain adding the sum.

"One hundred and twenty-seven thousand," he announced. "You-all can sell out now, Jack, and head for home."

The winner smiled and nodded, but seemed incapable of speech.

"Name your snake-juice, you-all—the winner pays!" Daylight called out loudly to all about him, at the same time rising from his chair and catching the Virgin by the arm. "Come on for a reel, you-all dancers. The night's young yet, and it's Helen Breakfast and the mail contract for me in the morning. Here, you-all Rawlins, you—I hereby do take over that same contract, and I start for salt water at nine a. m.—savvee? Come on, you-all! Where's that fiddler?"

CHAPTER II.

It was Daylight's night. He was the center and the head of the revel, unquenchably joyous, a contagion of fun. In between dances he paid over to Kearns the twenty thousand in dust and transferred to him his Moosehide claim. Likewise he arranged the taking over of Billy Rawlins' mail contract, and made his preparations for the start. He dispatched a messenger to rout out Kama, his dog-driver—a Tananaw Indian, far-wandered from his tribal home in the service of the invading whites. Kama entered the Tivoli, tall, lean, muscular, and fur-clad, the pick of his barbaric race and barbaric still, unshaken and unabashed by the revelers that rioted about him while Daylight gave his orders.

"Um," said Kama, tabbing his instructions on his fingers. "Get um letters from Rawlins. Load um on sled. Grub for Selkirk—you think um plenty dog-grub stop Selkirk?"

"Plenty dog-grub, Kama."

"She's a Comin', Fellows, Gold From the Grass Roots Down, a Hundred Dollars to the Pan."

"Um. Bring sled this place nine um clock. Bring um snowshoes. No bring um tent. Mebbe bring um fly? um little fly?"

"No fly," Daylight answered decisively. We travel light—savvee? We carry plenty letters out, plenty letters back. You are strong man. Plenty cold, plenty travel, all right."

"Sure all right," Kama muttered, with resignation. "Much cold, no care. Um ready nine um clock."

He turned on his moccasined heel and walked out, imperturbable, sphinx-like, neither giving nor receiving greetings nor looking to right or left. The Virgin led Daylight away into a corner.

"Look here, Daylight," she said in a low voice, "you're busted."

"Higher'n a kite."

"I've eight thousand in Mac's safe—" she began.

But Daylight interrupted. The apron-string loomed near and he shied like an unbroken colt.

"It don't matter," he said. "Busted I came into the world, busted I go out, and I've been busted most of the time since I arrived. Come on; let's waltz."

"But, listen," she urged. "My money's doing nothing. I could lend it to you—a grub-stake," she added, hurriedly, at sight of the alarm in his face.

"Nobody grub-stakes me," was the answer. "I stake myself, and when I make a killing it's sure all mine. No thank you, old girl. Much obliged. I'll get my stake by running the mail out and in." With a sudden well-assumed ebullition of spirits he drew her toward the dancing-floor, and as they swung around and around in a waltz she pondered on the iron heart of the man who held her in his arms and resisted all her wiles.

At six the next morning, scorching with whisky, yet ever himself, he stood at the bar putting every man's hand down. The way of it was that two men faced each other across a corner, their right elbows resting on the bar, their right hands gripped together, while each strove to press the other's hand down. Man after man came against him, but no man put his hand down, even Olaf Henderson and French Louis failing despite their hugeness.

"The winner pays!" Daylight cried. "Surge along you-all! This way to the snake-room!"

"I'm busted higher'n a kite, and I'm hittin' the trail for Dyea—"

"Goin' out?" some one called.

A spasm of anger wrought on his face for a flashing instant, but in the next good humor was back again.

"I know you-all are only pokin' fun asking such a question," he said with a smile. "Of course I ain't going out."

"Take the oath again, Daylight," the same voice cried.

"I sure will. I first come over Chilcoot in '83. I went out over the Pass in a fall blizzard, with a rag of a shirt and a cup of raw flour. I got my grub-stake in Juneau that winter, and in the spring I went out over the Pass once more. And once more the famine drove me out. Next spring I went in again, and I swore then that I'd never come out till I made my stake. Well, I ain't made it, and here I am. And I ain't going out now. I get the mail and I come right back. I won't stop the night at Dyea. I'll hit up Chilcoot soon as I change the dogs and get the mail and grub. And so I swear once more. I'll never hit for the Outside till I make my pile. And I tell you-all, here and now, it's got to be an almighty big pile. I'll be real conservative, and put the bottom notch at a million. And for not an ounce less'n that will I go out of the country. I tell you-all I got a hunch. There's a big strike coming on the Yukon, and it's just about due. I don't mean no ornery Moosehide, Birch creek kind of a strike. I mean a real rip-snorter hair-raiser. Nothing can stop her, and she'll come up river. There's where you-all'll track my moccasins in the near future if you-all want to find me—somewhere in the country around Stewart river, Indian river and Klondike river. When I get back with the mail, I'll head that way so fast you-all won't see my trail for smoke. She's a-coming, fellows, gold from the grass roots down, a hundred dollars to the pan, and a stampede in from the Outside fifty thousand strong."

"If I was you, Daylight, I wouldn't mush today," Joe Hines counseled, coming in from consulting the spirit thermometer outside the door. "We're in for a good cold snap. It's sixty-two below now, and still goin' down. Better wait till she breaks."

Daylight laughed, and the old sourdoughs around him laughed.

"It's a thousand miles to Dyea," Bettles announced, climbing on the chair and supporting his swaying body by an arm passed around Daylight's neck. "It's a thousand miles, I'm saying, an' most of the trail unbroke, but I bet any chechaquo—anything he wants—that Daylight makes Dyea in thirty days."

"That's an average of over thirty-three miles a day," Doc Watson warned, "and I've traveled some myself. A blizzard on Chilcoot would tie him up for a week."

"Yep," Bettles retorted, "an' Daylight'll do the second thousand back again on and in thirty days more, and I got five thousand dollars that says so, and damn the blizzards."

To emphasize his remarks, he pulled out a gold sack the size of a bologna sausage and thumped it down on the bar. Doc Watson thumped his own sack alongside.

"Hold on!" Daylight cried. "Bettles' right, and I want in on this. I bet five hundred that sixty days from now I pull up at the Tivoli door with the Dyea mail."

A skeptical roar went up, and a dozen men pulled out their sacks.

Not What You Pay.

"It isn't what you pay for clothes that makes you well dressed," said Mrs. Knicker.

And Mrs. Bocker remarked: "No, indeed; it's what you owe."

FARM and GARDEN

FIRE EXTINGUISHER IS HANDY

Many Small Conflagrations Easily Smothered by Use of Home-Made and Cheap Device.

A home-made fire extinguisher, easily made and always ready for use, can be easily made by anyone, as shown in the accompanying illustration. Procure the required number of thin, flat pint or quart bottles, make a solution composed of one gallon of water, three pounds of salt and one and one-half pounds of sal ammoniac, says the Homestead. Fill the bottles not quite full, and cork, seal the corks over with any sealing wax, tie a stout cord around the neck of each bottle and hang in any handy place. In case of fire, shake one of the bottles slightly to mix contents and throw in such a manner that it will break as close as possible to the fire. A gas is formed that will smother out the fire. By using the inexpensive extinguishers many small conflagrations may be prevented and many times the small fire will cause the big one if not placed under control in time.

EFFECTIVE TRAP FOR RATS

Water-Tight Barrel Placed in Dark Corner of Barn With Head Knocked Out is Good.

A simple but effective rat trap can be constructed in any barn by simply setting in a dark corner a water-tight barrel, with the head knocked out and the top made accessible to the rats by placing boxes near it or arranging boards or poles so as to enable them to climb up, says the Northwest Homestead. The barrel needs to be filled about two-thirds full of such rubbish as corncobs and chips and something put on top to entice the rats. After they become familiar with the surroundings and resort to the barrel regularly, which they will in about a week if present, the barrel should be cleaned out and filled about three-quarters full of water; enough chaff should then be thrown in to cover the water and with it a block of wood, on each side of which a piece of bacon has been tacked. This will induce the first rat to jump in to eat the bacon, the next one will not hesitate to do likewise, and then there will be a fight for the possession of the block. The noise will attract other rats, and when they get in, no matter how many there may be up to a certain extent they will all drown.

PANEL FENCE IS EXCELLENT

Among Other Advantages It Can Be Fastened to Posts Without the Use of Nails.

In building the larger part of all board fences made, the boards are nailed to the posts, which is a mistake. The posts rot off after a few years and the fence goes down. It is then impossible to pull the nails and get the boards off without splitting them. Panels like the one shown in the sketch are wired to the posts, says the Homestead. When the post breaks off the wires are loosened and another post set in its place. These panels will last nearly half a century and outstand several sets of posts. The space between the boards should be increased from bottom to top. The up and down pieces extend below the bottom board to keep the panel up from the ground, also two inches above the top board so that when the end becomes soft the strength will not be lessened where the nails go through. Another advantage of this kind of fence is that when one wants to drive from one field to another a panel can be easily opened at any point.

FINAL RESULT OF IMPURE BLOOD

The System Is Left Weak, Run Down and Helpless Against the Attacks of Disease.

If you need strength, if your blood is thin, your digestion disordered, it will pay you to investigate the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, the remedy that has transformed so many weak, anæmic, dyspeptic, ambitionless people into strong, healthy, hungry men and women.

Mrs. Lena May Roberts, whose address is R. F. D. No. 3, Aberdeen, So. Dakota after several months of suffering finally found the right tonic in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says:

"For months after the birth of my baby, I suffered terribly from a general breakdown in health. I was in bed for three months and after that was able to be up only part of the time. I was sick all over, being pale, weak and thin. My appetite was gone and my head ached most of the time. Oftentimes there seemed to be a rush of blood to my head and I would faint away. I was very nervous and was not strong enough to do any work.

"As the treatment I was taking did not help me, I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which a friend said had helped her. After taking a few boxes, I began to get well rapidly. I continued using them for a time and am now as well and strong as ever in my life."

The value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in general debility lies in their direct response to the needs of the blood. Their work is to make new blood. That they do this well is shown by the gradual disappearance of the symptoms and the return of color and health. They lay the foundation for permanent health in the future.

For the same reason these pills have cured anæmia, after-effects of the grip and fevers, rheumatism, indigestion, and nervousness, dizziness, neuralgia and St. Vitus' dance, and are recommended wherever a tonic for the blood and nerves is needed.

A valuable booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," containing fuller information about rheumatism and other diseases of the blood will be sent free upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. [illegible]

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30, 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Thief River Falls will get that new power plant to woking nicely, by the time they get the spring power from Red Lake River.

We wonder why Taft don't call on his Democratic friends that so nobly stood by him, to ram that Reciprocity pact down the throats of the farmers of the Northwest. Whats the matter with the steel trust and Jim Hill, William? Wake them up. Tell them you need them.

Alva Eastman, the St. Cloud editor has filed for Cangressman at large from Minnesota. He was a strong indorser of Tafts Reciprocity pact, and will undebtly be sent to keep him company, when the farmers get a turn at the bat.

Judgeing by the financicial statement, of Pennington county, there has not been much work done by our County officials for the love of god, or sympythy for the tax payers. That's right boys, sock it to them. That's what we said you'd do, and you know THE SUBEAM don't lie.

While Senator Knut Nelson may be a little old fashiond on some of the ideas of the progressive Republicans, yet he is right up to date when you touch the interests of the farmers of Minnesota, as he showed by his fight made agains Reciprocity, when he went up against the power that the people had given to that democrat, "Reciporcity Taft." If Knute Nelson is a candidate for reelection he is entitled to the support of the farmers of this state, and you bet they will deliver the goods.

The finacial statement of Pennington county is out and it's a whale. For godsake don't send any sample copies of it east to inconrage emigration. It proves one fact, which is that THE SUNBEAM was right about the expense of starting a new county. We wonder what became of all of them cheap men that Professor Hay used to tell us about that we could get to trascribe them records so cheap? We guess they must have skipped out to Canada after division! However Pennington county will pull throu with flying colors, as they have taxable realestate behind them. There is now very little government land left and we have no large tracts of state lands exempt from taxation, which will make this one of the richest counties in Northern Minnesota, in a few years, but it is best to suppress the circulation of that finacial statement for the present.

There is no reason why a President of the United States should not serve three or more terms if he is fairly elected every four years. There is still less reason why he should not be re-elected after he has been out of office four years amongst the people as a paivate citizen The mere fact that Washington, after a long and strendous public service preferred to retire at the end of his second term, is not unsurmountable reason why a man fifty two years of age whose services have been eminent and who still has the confidence of the people and the physical and mental vigor and rare experience to make his services valuable to the nation, should not be re-elected. Yes,—anybody can guess to whom we refer, and we expect the nation to see the point next June too. All the schemes and booms of others will "fly to flinders" before the June cyclone.—Northwestern Agriculturist.

SINGSONG GIRLS.

They Are to China What the Geishas Are to Japan.

"Singsong" girls of China are first cousins to the geishas of Japan. These young ladies vary in age from sixteen to thirty and are chosen for their physical and their artistic attractiveness. The singsong girls are habited in coat and trousers of the finest silk, satin or brocade. The former is cut very much in the style of a French ouvrier's blouse, and the latter are cylindrical, falling to the ankles and disclosing the finest silk hosiery and the daintiest embroidered shoes.

At an understood interval one of the singsong girls comes forward to play an instrumental solo. It is more or less a fantasia on two notes, the pitch lying at about E in the treble clef, with squeaky high excursions. No sheet of music is unfolded, the Chinese professional singer being expected to know the words as well as the music of at least 500 ballads. There are sure to be solos, duets and trios, and here the male orchestra comes in with fine enthusiasm in accompanying the singers.

Sometimes there is a tremendous racket in the midst of a most pathetic episode, which prevents you entirely from gathering the meaning of the song. But custom has sanctioned these outbreaks, which are understood of the Celestials, though it is certain no western star singer would put up with them at any price.—Chicago News.

When Rhymes Come Hard.

Matthew Arnold complained of the unmusical sound of the names of many of his countrymen. But an American is astonished by the substantial musical quality of countless English names. A list of "first year" students at one of the English colleges for women contains hardly a name that lacks euphony, and many of them, like the following, are a "treat" to the ear: Laetitia Helen Alford, Alice Senga Margaret Bryson, Ethel Muriel Meredith. But is any name quite so musical as Meredith, and has any name so ravishing a connotation? An English journalist some weeks ago set himself the task of finding a rhyme for it and produced "out-Herodeth," which was clever if not affording a perfect accord.—Detroit Free Press.

Dyspeptic Philosophy.

Money talks, but sometimes it contradicts itself.

Some girls blush naturally. With others it's all put on.

Lots of people live in the same square who don't move in the same circle.

Some men will give $1 to charity and then spend $10 to advertise the fact.

We are all apt to be generous to a fault, if the fault happens to be one of our own.

Where the bill collector is concerned absence surely makes the heart grow fonder.

Never strike a man when he is down, especially if you are going to strike him for a loan.

Why is it that the people who don't know right from wrong seem always to be in the wrong?—New York Times.

Important to Her.

"How absurd some of the jokes about married people are!" says he.

"Aren't they?" laughed his fiancee.

"I read some today about married men having to wash the dishes and that sort of thing."

"Perfectly ridiculous!"

"As if a man ever would have to wash the dishes after he got married!"

"Silly!"

"Seems to me they could find something funnier than that to print."

"Indeed, yes."

The weather has morderated a little the past week, and we think that the extream cold weather is about done for this winter.

There is to be a basket party at the residence of John Radneicki, in Deer Park township tomorrow night. All are invited.

Mirtin Hyland took a load of Highlanding young people down to the basket part at Fores on last Saturday evening, and all report having a good time.

It looks to day as if we was going to get a thaw, and we hope to see it melt snow enough along Red Lake River so the stock can get water, as the present conditions are becoming desperate.

K. Kratzer is cutting the ice in the Clearwater river for the Highlanding creamery and it will be hawled by the cremery patrons a distance of eight miles, whith a navigable river running by the door of the creamery, that has been closed off by the lumber company.

With a new blacksmith and machine shop and a new meat market that are going to be put in at Highlanding this spring, it would seem like we had ought to get a Doctor and a drug store to locate here the comming year, as it would certainly be a good location.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter McAndress returned home from St. Hilaire on Monday evening, as Mr. Martain McAndress, who has been very seariously ill is now on the way to recovery, which fact we are pleased to note, as he is a personal friend of ours.

The people living up this way will either go to the Clearwater river for their ice, or do without. We hope the icemen of Thief River Falls will deliver a good big chunk of that Red Lake river ice at the door of the Times Office every morning, during the warm weather, at about breakfast time.

Simon Solbeg, of McIntosh who bought the Frank Jeffers farm a short time ago, was up here this week and moved up a gasoline saw rig which he will saw popular logs into lumber with. He will also put in a meat market this spring at Highlanding.

Last Friday Edon Davis sold the Highlanding blacksmith shop formely owned by E. Pederson, to Walter Anderson of Kolstrad Minn. Mr. Anderson is a first class blacksmith and has a full set of tools which he will ship here at once, and be ready for business by March 1st. R.R. Ashley, representing the Williams Hardware Co., of Minneapolis was in Town and sold Mr. Anderson a full stock of goods which will be shipped at once.

A sort of a Socialist speaker put his hands in his pockets and shot wisdom! at a small audience at the Highlanding school house Wednesday evening. He advised the people to use tobacco and drink intoxicating liquers so as to furnish employment for the manufacturers. He also roasted the churches and ministers, and quoted history enough to convince any school boy that when he entered the school room someone throwed the U.S. History out of the window. The Socialist party advocate some good ideas and principals, but they had ought to muzzle a calf of that kind before they turn him loose in a respectiable community.

There was a mistake made in the price of the Kolski cord wood last week. $2, and 25 cents per cord is the right price.

IN THE MILLENNIUM.

When Our Weather Man Becomes Polite.

If it suits the great American people Tuesday will be a bit blustery. Your humble weather prognosticator would beg of you to remember that winter is now upon us and that the unpleasant days have been held off as long as possible. If it is the will of the majority the morning will open up with sun, grow a bit troubled by noon, then cloud over rapidly until by the middle of the afternoon the atmospheric conditions will make a fire seem more cheerful than usual. The man behind your weather bureau would remind you that this is the best he can do by you and that by beginning with a fair morning and have the day grow clouded as the hours pass away a sudden change is thus avoided and many ruffled nerves are saved. On account of the extreme lateness of the season the bureau would call the fact to your attention that many worse days have been experienced at this time of the year and that it has striven hard to suit the majority. "A little fortitude and patience on your part will make the day slip by much more quickly, and the state of mind with which you receive it that morning, the department would point out, determines in a great way whether or not the day drags heavily on your hand.—Judge's Library.

Too Hasty.

At a lecture a well known authority on economics mentioned the fact that in some parts of America the number of men was considerably larger than that of women, and he added humorously. "I can therefore recommend the ladies to emigrate to that part." A young woman seated in one of the last rows of the auditorium got up and full of indignation, left the room rather noisily, whereupon the lecturer remarked, "I did not mean that it should be done in such a hurry."—Tit-Bits.

The Charm of Venice.

A young lady who had returned from a tour through Italy with her father informed a friend that he liked all the Italian cities, but most of all he loved Venice. "Ah, Venice, to be sure!" said the friend. "I can readily understand that your father would like Venice, with its gondolas, and St. Mark's, and Michelangelos." "Oh, no," the young lady interrupted, "it wasn't that. He liked it because he could sit in the hotel and fish from the window."—Catholic News.

A Vain Effort.

"Why don't you take an interest in affairs?" said the offhand adviser. "Why don't you read the newspapers so that you can converse intelligently with your husband?"

"I tried to," replied young Mrs. Torkins, "but I made a mistake. I read the president's message instead of the football news."—Washington Star

The Drop.

The Weather man he sighed full long
  And cried: "'Tis thankless plan

Here I've been criticised by all
  That warm the weather was:
That flies annoyed and skeeters too

"Unseasonable, the public said,
  The weather of the past,
And wondered in sarcastic way
  How long it was to last.
So then I thought their taste to please,
  This Cerberus give a sop,
And, taking down the temperature,
  I gave them quite a drop.

"Quite satisfied? Well, that's the point!
  No: not a little bit!

SAVED BY A SONG.

When Santley and His Party Faced Death in Mexico.

Few people are aware that on one occasion a timely song saved Sir Charles Santley's life. The famous baritone was one of a party traveling under military escort through a bandit infested region in Mexico when the guards suddenly bolted, leaving the travelers to the mercy of a band of booty hunters. These desperadoes, finding the spoil less valuable than they expected, decided to slay their captives and fare forth on another foray.

An inspiration came to Santley. Surrounded by friends and foes, he commenced an aria and sang in his own inimitable way. As the notes rippled forth on the clear mountain air the bandits' faces lighted up with pleasure, and at the finish the leader expressed his delight and asked the senor to sing again.

Santley saw his chance and seized it. He inquired if he might sing for the liberty of the little party, and a reluctant consent was given. For several hours during that never to be forgotten night he enthralled his captors with a generous program of exquisite melodies. The next day the bandits tendered payment by taking the whole party down the mountain side and setting them free. Notwithstanding later triumphs Sir Charles Santley never surpassed that one.—London Graphic.

Helpful Anyhow.

They were discussing an absentee, and not all their remarks were favorable. One, however, spoke in his defense. "Whatever his failings may be," he said, "he thinks of more little ways of being helpful than any other person I know. One day I was with him at a ferryhouse where a crowd was waiting for the boat. Suddenly he left me and walked toward a woman who was struggling with a three-year-old and a number of parcels. Our friend raised his hat, spoke to the woman, and then I saw him grapple her parcels. Soon he returned to my side, and I asked him, 'What was it?' 'Oh, nothing,' he said carelessly. 'She had too many parcels. I put a rubber band around them and bunched them into one.' I was disgusted with myself that I had not thought of that simple little expedient for helping the woman, and ever since that time I have had much respect for our friend, although I can't indorse all of his ways."—New York Press.

War Time Coffee.

This was the formula of a coffee mixture that sold freely in the days of gross adulteration during and immediately subsequent to the war between the states before matters began to right themselves:

Best Java coffee, one pound; rye, three pounds. Carefully clean the rye from all bad grains, wash to remove dust, drain off the water and put the grain into the roaster, carefully stirring to brown it evenly. Roast the coffee separately. Grind the mixture and pack in air tight containers. An essence of coffee was prepared by boiling down molasses until hard and then grinding it to a powder and mixing it with half a pound of good ground Java coffee, using four pounds of the powdered molasses.—Ideal Grocer.

COST OF GRAIN GROWING IN CENTRAL CANADA

A careful canvass made of a number of men farming in a large way indicates that even with the extreme expense of harvesting the crop, which has been caused by the bad weather and difficulty in threshing, wheat has been produced and put on the market for less than 55 cents a bushel. The average freight rate is not over 13 cents per bushel. This would make the cost of production and freight 68 cents and would leave the farmer an actual margin on his low-grade wheat of 17½ cents and for his high-grade wheat of 19½ cents; and though this is not as large a profit as the farmer has every right to expect, it is a profit not to be despised, and which should leave a very fair amount of money to his credit when all the expenses of the year have been paid, unless the value of low-grade wheat sinks very much below its present level. A matter of importance to the prospective settler is that of the cost of production. The following table has been prepared after careful investigation:

Interest on 320 acres, value $30 per acre, 3 years at 6 per cent interest	$1,720.00
Interest on horses, machinery, wagons, ploughs, harrows, etc., to operate 320 acres—say $2,500 for 3 years	450.00
Getting 320 acres ready for crop first year, doing one's own work, with hired help, about $3.50 per acre	1,120.00
Getting 320 acres ready for crop, second and third year, about $1.25 per acre per year, or $2.50 per acre 2 years one's own work and hired help	800.00
Seed per year, wheat, per acre $1.25, 3 years	1,200.00
Seeding, 320 acres, 25 cents per acre, 3 years	240.00
Twine, 320 acres, 30 cents per acre, 3 years	288.00
Harvesting, 320 acres, 30 cents per acre, 3 years	288.00
Marketing, 320 acres, estimate 20 bushels per acre per year for 3 years, 3 cents per bushel, or 9 cents per bushel for 3 years	576.00
Threshing 320 acres, estimate 20 bushels per acre per year for 3 years, 6 cents per bushel per year or 18 cents for 3 years	1,152.00
Total	$7,834.00
Cr.
By wheat crop farm 320 acres for 3 years, average 20 bushels per acre per year for 3 years, or a total of 60 bushels, = 19,200 bushels at 80 cents per bushel	$15,380.00
Balance to credit of farm after 3 years operation, $2,563.00 per year	7,526.00

"To operate 480 acres would cost less in proportion, as the plant required for 320 acres would do for the larger farm, and the interest on plant for the extra 160 acres would be saved."

The figures given may be open to criticism, but they will be found to be reasonably accurate, with a fairness given to the expense columns. There are those who profess to do the work at a much less cost than those given.

GEORGE WASHINGTON,— ARCHITECT AND BUILDER

NO person in the least degree conversant with the biography of George Washington can fail to admire the extreme versatility of the Father of His Country. As a warrior and as a statesman he won fame in a superlative degree and yet it may be found, upon research, that he showed the same exceptional measure of ability in the more modest pursuits of planter and country squire. There is, however, one branch of the great man's activities that has been almost wholly overlooked by students of the many-sided Washington. This concerns his numerous and extensive undertakings as an architect and builder—operations that in scope might have seemed to afford a sufficient career for any ordinary citizen.

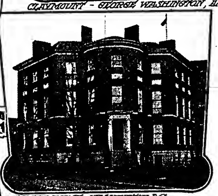
Of course there is no desire to create the impression that the nation's first president was professionally an "architect and builder" as we interpret the term today. On the contrary at no period of his life did he devote his entire time to this form of activity nor did he depend upon it as a means of livelihood. But circumstances seemed to combine to compel Washington to assume responsibilities as an amateur architect and builder, if we may thus qualify the term. On the one hand was the circumstance that he was master of an eight thousand-acre estate and there was always more or less building and rebuilding to be done on such a domain. On the other hand, George Washington, in later life, as the leading official of a new republic and the founder of a new capital, had thrust upon him innumerable questions of architectural policy and selection which, perforce, requisitioned all his ability in this line.

GARDEN WALLS AT MT. VERNON — DESIGNED BY WASHINGTON

DESIGNED BY WASHINGTON

CLAYMOUNT - GEORGE WASHINGTON, ARCHITECT.

ARLINGTON MANSION, FOLLOWING WASHINGTON'S ARCHITECTURAL IDEAS



OCTAGON HOUSE WASHINGTON, D.C. DESIGNED BY GEORGE WASHINGTON

AN ENDURING SPECIMEN OF OLD-TIME SOUTHERN ARCHITECTURE—

That Washington should have developed such ability as a practical and consulting architect is by no means strange when we take into account his early experience as a surveyor. This occupation which he followed during much of his young manhood gave him splendid judgment as to the relative qualifications of sites for both private and public buildings, and his discernment was reflected in the advice he gave as to the sites for the public buildings at the national capital and the character of the buildings to be erected thereon.

According to tradition, George Washington, seated on the veranda of an elevated country house, with the panorama of the present District of Columbia spread out before him, chose what is now known as Capitol Hill as the site of the legislative headquarters of the government. He also not only chose the site of the White House or Presidential Mansion, but personally conducted the negotiations for the purchase of the needed land. The work of actually designing the various public buildings and laying out the streets and parks of the new Federal City was left by Washington in other hands, but up to the time of his last illness he exercised a general supervision of all creative work and his architectural ideas were embodied in most of the plans drawn.

But while Washington acted as consulting architect with reference to many of our most notable public buildings he was actually and directly responsible for the plans of many private residences and these are consequently of even greater interest than the public buildings as evidence of his architectural ideals. The structures are located not only on his own estate at Mount Vernon on the Potomac, but at various other points in Virginia and what is now West Virginia. The mansion at Mount Vernon was not the original conception of George Washington, having been built by his half-brother, Lawrence Washington, some dozen years ere it came into the possession of George Washington through inheritance. However, George Washington enlarged the original residence by increasing its length and height and he added various notable improvements to the manor house as well as erecting from his own architectural designs a number of supplementary buildings that finally gave Mount Vernon the semblance of a well-ordered village. General Washington even planned the walks which are a conspicuous feature of the landscape work at Mount Vernon.

About five miles from Mount Vernon is Woodlawn, a charming Colonial mansion which stands to this day in an excellent state of preservation and is generally accounted, next to Mount Vernon, the most significant of all the buildings that bear the impress of Washington's individuality. General Washington built Woodlawn as a wedding gift for his favorite, Nelly Custis, the adopted daughter upon whom centered the affections of his later life. The main building at Woodlawn, which is of pure Colonial design, is forty by sixty feet in size. As in all such structures there are wings connected by corridors with the main structure and these wings are little more than one story in height, while the central portion has a height of two stories.

Likewise located at no great distance from Mount Vernon is Arlington Mansion, which is, in almost the same degree as the manor house just mentioned, a monument to the architectural ability of George Washington. The mansion at Arlington, to be sure, was not erected until after the death of Washington, but the builder was Washington Parke Custis, the adopted son of George Washington, who had lived for years at Mount Vernon and who was not only thoroughly familiar with Washington's architectural ideas, but had talked over with him the requirements of the site at Arlington. Yet other houses for the design and construction of which George Washington was responsible are located in the picturesque Shenandoah Valley—a region with which he was particularly familiar by reason of the fact that as a young man he made the original surveys of all this land for Lord Fairfax.

George Washington induced his three brothers to select this promising region for their homes and he personally built, for his eldest brother, Samuel, the famous Harewood Mansion on a commanding site facing the Blue Ridge Mountains. Two miles from Harewood is Claymount, which is generally accounted George Washington's architectural masterpiece. He drew the plans for this mansion, but did not supervise its construction, which was carried on by a relative. The manor house consists of a central building of brick with two commodious wings and, on each side a separate two-story building connected with the long rectangular building by a brick-walled court yard thirty feet square. The connected buildings, which are all constructed almost wholly of yellow brick, have an aggregate length of two hundred and fifty feet. On the north front of this expansive structure a stone portico relieves the rather severe outlines.

However, Washington's ability as a designer of residences was not by any means limited to country homes. There are in the city of Washington several buildings which attest his talent in this direction with reference to dwellings in urban surroundings. Perhaps the most interesting and certainly the most historic in this category is "Octagon House," which is located only a few blocks from the White House and is today one of the show places of the capital, having served in later years as the permanent headquarters of the American Institute of Architects. The nation's first chief magistrate laid off the ground in this vicinity and prepared the original plans for the mansion, although, as in the case of two of the mansions above mentioned, it was left to others to carry out the plans thus formulated.

Octagon House, which is of added interest because it was temporarily used as the Presidential Mansion after the British soldiers burned the White House in 1814, derives its name from its octagonal form. Indeed, buildings of unusual outline seem to have been something of a fad with Architect George Washington. He built a sixteen-sided barn at Mount Vernon and the mill he constructed on that estate was likewise many-sided. Almost under the shadow of the capitol at Washington is a substantial brick building which George Washington built just before his last illness overtook him and which he had designed as a winter residence. Indeed, owing to delays the last details of construction were not completed until after Washington's death and none of his family ever occupied the structure.

Washington's Coat-of-Arms

Regarding the Washington coat-of-arms some odd discoveries have come to light. Quite contrary to our American belief the Washington shield does not contain "stars and stripes," notwithstanding that more than a thousand books and as many more published articles so proclaim it. The facts are that the Washington shield contain "bars and mullets (spurs of the knight's boots.)" The earliest reference which I have been able to find which announces the Washington shield blazoned with stars and stripes, relates to a public banquet at Baltimore, Md., in 1851, where the ideas of an English poet—Martin Tupper by name—were voiced, proclaiming that the American flag, with its heraldic notions, was borrowed from the Washington shield, which possessed stars and stripes. Ever since this banquet American authors and orators have, without further investigation, accepted the statement as correct. The English poet was misled by his fervid fancy, for the Heralds' college at London, the highest authority on British heraldry, writes as follows:

"A Washington shield with stars and stripes (pales) has never been of record."

It is altogether probable that Tupper, as well as others, was deceived by the shape of the "mullets." These spurs, as worn by the knights of old, were round in form, resembling modern cog-wheels somewhat, and their bristling points possibly suggested the "stars" of which Tupper spoke.

"HORSE SCHOOL"

FIRST OF THE KIND HOLDS A THREE-DAY SESSION AT THE AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL.

MORE THAN 300 ATTEND

School Was Conducted Under Direction of the Minnesota Stallion Registration Board—Valuable Instruction Given.

With an attendance of more than 300, the first "horse school" in Minnesota was held at the agricultural college of the university, opening with an address by Dr. C. W. McCampbell, professor of animal husbandry at the Kansas State Agricultural college, on "Transmissible Unsoundness." The school was given under the auspices of the Minnesota stallion registration board in connection with the short course for farmers now in session at the farm school and continued three days. Professor H. R. Smith, who was recently appointed head of the animal husbandry department of the Minnesota Agricultural college was scheduled to open the session, but was unable to finish his work at the University of Nebraska, and spoke Thursday.

In connection with the lectures a number of pure bred and prize-winning horses were shown. President George E. Vincent's two saddle horses were among them. A carload lot of Percherons from the Crandell & Danforth farm at Randolph, were shown. There were five pure bred horses in the lot. Three pure bred Belgians from A. Noltimier's farm at St. Paul Park were displayed. The college had nine registered head of horses on exhibition. Two of these, Queen Mary and Queen Lily, were prize-winners at the International stock show in Chicago two years ago. Queen Lily carried off the blue ribbon in the Clydesdale mares class, while Queen Mary was the second prize winner in the 2-year-old class of Clydesdales. President Vincent's horses are both registered American saddle horses, Bessy Diamond's sire being one of the greatest show horses of America. Rooster Blees, a gray, was sired by Rex Blees, a many time prize-winner while alive. They were the only light horses shown.

The Minnesota Horse Breeders' association conducted a postponed meeting during the three days of the school. One of the features of the program was a demonstration of the correct care and shoeing of horses' feet by Allen Johnstoe, instructor in blacksmithing at the farm school.

The horse school will be made a permanent feature of the farmers' short course if the plans of J. S. Montgomery of the department of animal husbandry of the college, who is in charge of arrangements of the present course, are carried out. "We not only hope to make the school permanent," said Mr. Montgomery, "but we plan to add others to it. Next year we will try to arrange to have three sessions for breeders of cattle, sheep and hogs respectively. Thus raisers of these various kinds of stock can come here for three days and hear some of the best authorities of the country in their respective lines tell them of the latest and best approved methods of handling their specialty."

Mr. Montgomery gave lessons in horse judging. Percheron and Belgian horses were judged Thursday. Mr. Montgomery demonstrated the judging of Clydesdales and light horses, using the stock belonging to the school for the first class and President Vincent's horses for the second.

Dr. William L. Boyd of the college of agriculture spoke Wednesday on horse diseases; G. L. Carlson of Norfolk, Neb., editor of Carlson's Breeders' Review, discussed "Lessons in Horse Breeding," and J. S. Montgomery gave an illustrated horse lecture in the evening. "Feeding and Care of Brood Mares and Foals" was the subject of an address by Charles B. Crandall of Randolph, Minn., president of the Minnesota Horse Breeders' association; "Making and Fitting Horses' Collars" was considered by Dr. Edward G. Leech of Winona, secretary of the Minnesota Veterinary association, and "Market Classes and Grades of Horses" by J. S. Montgomery.

HIGH DIVE INTO SNOW

Foot-Warmer Starts Fire in Hay Load—Farmer and Sister Jump to Safety.

Little Falls.—While coming to this city on a load of hay, Mike Grzonka, a Swan River farmer, and his sister escaped cremating only by diving into a near-by snowbank. They had a hot brick on the load as a foot-warmer. The brick set fire to the hay and the blaze was not discovered until it had eaten its way into their clothing. The dive into the snow extinguished their blazing clothes.

ELECTION IN DULUTH

$750,000 Bond Issue Proposition Is Also Carried in Municipal Elections.

Duluth. — Dr. J. A. McCuen, the Republican candidate for mayor of Duluth, was elected over Dr. M. B. Cullum, the present Democratic mayor, by about 3 to 1. Mayor Cullum concedes McCuen's election. One Socialist, P. J. Phillips, was elected alderman, from the Eighth ward. The bond issue, which was carried, calls for a $750,000 electric light plant.

TWO DEAD IN GAS EXPLOSION

FARM HOME NEAR KENYON, MINN., CATCHES FIRE.

Cold Causes Acetylene Generator to Leak, Resulting in Fatal Accident.

Kenyon.—Alma and Lyla Hildebrandt, aged seven and fourteen, respectively, were instantly killed, and two brothers and a sister, ranging between the ages of 5 and 12 years, were seriously injured when a gas generator exploded in the home of their parents, setting fire to the house. All were children of John W. Hildebrandt, a farmer living seven miles from here. Mr. Hildebrandt and wife and two babies were visiting in Farmington at the time of the accident and the oldest girl was left in charge of the household.

It is thought the extreme cold of the last few days affected the generator of the acetylene lighting system and resulted in the tragedy. Neighbors were quickly summoned by the only child to escape uninjured, but by the time they arrived upon the scene the farmhouse was a sheet of flames and the injured children and the bodies of the two girl victims were gotten out with difficulty. As quickly as possible the injured children were brought to town and were attended by Doctors Gates and Bekke, who pronounced them in a critical condition. Mr. and Mrs. Hildebrandt were notified as soon as they could be communicated with and they will arrive here early today.

THREE DIE IN FIRE

Home of Ole Ambrosen Is Burned at Yucatan.

La Crosse, Wisconsin. — Three of a family are dead, one fatally and two seriously injured as a result of a fire in the dwelling of Ole Ambroson, Yucatan, Minn., during the night, the origin of which is unknown.

The dead: Christopher Ambroson, aged 86 years; Clara Ambroson, aged 7 years; Onga Ambroson, aged 10 years.

The injured: Ole Ambrosen, in a critical condition; Albert Ambroson, arm cut, bruised and burned, and Mrs. Ole Ambroson, hand face and hands severely burned.

Three of the family had gone to bed for the night while the rest remained in the kitchen by the fire. It was 20 below zero outside.

Startled by a shriek, the father saw his son, Adolph leap from the stairway followed by a cloud of smoke and flames. A moment later he was followed by his brother. The mother and father made heroic efforts to rescue the other children and the grandfather, but the fire had made such rapid progress they failed, and had to be held by the other children to prevent them going to their own death in the burning home. Ole Ambroson was so badly injured and burned he will probably die, while the mother was seriously injured. The origin of the fire is a mystery.

The injured were brought to the Lutheran hospital here.

Hjelmar, Albert and Carl escaped with slight injuries.

WADES SNOW FOR BABES

Mother Walks Nine Miles Through Cold to Get Food for Children.

Duluth.—Mrs. Konstn Mattala, mother of nine children the eldest of which is 14 years, donned a pair of her absent husband's boots and walked nine miles through roads drifted with snow, from her cabin to Tower to get food for her children. Her husband had been intoxicated at Tower and was arrested on a charge of larceny and sent to Duluth to serve a short term.

Now it is said that he never was guilty and his conduct while drunk was misunderstood. The family back in the woods in the cabin was greatly in need of food and the mother started out to secure it. She came through to Duluth and told her story.

Relief was procured for the mother and children, and the father, who was in trouble for the first time in 16 years will be liberated.

ANOTHER SHORT COURSE

Outline of Program for the Week Beginning Feb. 19 at Little Falls.

Little Falls.—Final arrangements have been made for the farmers' short course to be held the week of Feb. 18. Prizes are to be offered for the judging of seeds and stock and several local men will tell of their own experiences in farming. The program for the week is as follows: Monday, corn; Tuesday, dairying; Wednesday, horses and hogs; Thursday, potatoes and clover; Friday forenoon, silos and silage; afternoon, visiting neighboring farms; Saturday forenoon, poultry; afternoon, talks on organization.

Each day will be divided into six periods and the subject under discussion into as many parts.

RANGE BALL LEAGUE

Fans Plan Organization to Take in Duluth and Superior as Well.

Virginia. — Plans are afoot among range fans for a new baseball league to take in Virginia, Hibbing, Chisholm, Eveleth, Duluth and Superior. Virginia has about 15,000 population, Hibbing about 10,000, Eveleth with locations 100,000 and Chisholm 8,000. All are known as good baseball towns and draw from 2,000 to 3,000 attendance.

100 NEW BRIDGES

SUMMER'S PLANS OF COUNTY BOARDS MOST EXTENSIVE SINCE WORK BEGAN.

MANY ASK FOR STATE AID

$300,000 For Distribution—Structures Proposed One-half as Many Built With State Aid Since 1907.

St. Paul.—One hundred bridges, half as many as have been constructed with state aid since 1907, will be built on state roads in Minnesota during 1912, if the applications for this purpose from the county boards pending with the State Highway commission are allowed when the commission makes its annual allotment of state aid at its next meeting, February 27.

Because they will be larger, these hundred bridges will cost practically the same as did the two hundred previously constructed, or $40,000, according to Carl E. Nagel, bridge engineer for the commission. In former years it has been the custom of the county boards not to ask for state aid on the larger bridges they intended to build, because the annual allotment of $1,000 was not large enough to take care of the road work they desired done.

Average Cost Is Higher.

Where it had $80,000 to distribute in 1911, the commission will apportion 300,000 this year, and this great increase in the funds is responsible for the unusual amount of bridge work planned for 1912. Some of the bridges are the small, short beam span across creeks, while others run as long as a 160-foot beam structure. Where it is cheaper to use steel, it will be used, but in as many cases as possible cement will be used.

The average cost of the bridges built during the last four years has been $2,000, according to Mr. Nagel, the cost ranging from $1,200 for the smallest to $5,000 for the largest. The average cost of those to be built during 1912 will be about $4,000.

The commission's engineers prepare the plans and specifications for all of these bridges, and in addition other bridges built at the expense of the townships or counties, for which applications are received. During the last four years, the commission's engineers have investigated and planned two hundred other bridges than those on state roads, to which the state contributed no aid.

The law of the last Legislature, saying a county is not liable for the cost of a bridge unless it is approved by the commission, has resulted in bringing in more of these applications, instead of the former requests for the engineers to pass upon bridges after they have been constructed on plans not prepared by the commission, Mr. Nagel said. The attorney general's department has ruled that to gain the benefit of the law, the counties or townships must have the bridges constructed on plans prepared by the commission.

GIRL NOT TO BE DENIED

Chooses a Second Guardian and Wins His Consent to Marriage.

Litchfield. — Clerk of Court C. H. Atkinson last week issued a marriage license to Gerhard Thedar and Mary Dank, both of Forest Prairie. The bride-elect is an orphan between 16 and 17 years of age, and in order for her to be granted a license to wed it was necessary that the consent of her guardian be obtained. The guardian was a Forest Prairie farmer, and he refused permission. There is a law, however, that helped to solve the difficulty. This provides that after a minor arrives at the age of 14 he or she may dismiss the guardian appointed previously and select another.

Acting under this law, Miss Dank applied to the probate court to have Michael Ryan of this city appointed her guardian, which was done. She then asked and obtained his consent to her marriage to Mr. Thedar and the license was issued.

WARFARE ON WEEDS

Grand Jury Makes Recommendation Which Meets With Hearty Response.

Thief River Falls.—The Pennington county grand jury at its recent session adopted a resolution calling attention to the provisions of law relative to the suppression of noxious weeds, and suggested that each town be divided into three districts, one of which shall be assigned to each member of the town board and over which he shall have general supervision for the purpose of aiding in the enforcement of the noxious weed laws. The farmers have taken up the proposition of clean seed and are determined in future to avoid the heavy loss to which they are subjected by reason of the heavy percentage of weed seeds in their grains.

Volstad Against Reciprocity.

Washington.—Through an error in transcribing the votes on the poll at the Minnesota delegation on presidential preferences, Representative Volstead was put in the position of favoring any progressive who favored Canadian reciprocity. Mr. Volstead should have been quoted as saying just the opposite—that is, that he favored any progressive who opposed Canadian reciprocity. Mr. Volstead was opposed to the Canadian reciprocity agreement from the beginning of the agitation for it.

HE WAS SOMEWHAT PEEVED

Attendant at Spiritualistic Seance Considered Himself Aggrieved and Said So.

Charles M. Cross of Indianapolis thinks variety adds spice to life, so he went to a spiritualistic service.

It was a lively affair with sepulchral voices sounding through trumpets, tambourines playing mysteriously in mid air, and cold, clammy hands of partially materialized men and women making free in the dusky room with those who were in the flesh. In the midst of it something dealt Mr. Cross a vicious whack on the nose and he called for lights in a tone not to be disobeyed. With the light the circle as disclosed was all natural and human again. The most human member of it was Mr. Cross, with a bloody nose, spoiling for a fight and all the "madder" because he did not know whom to fight.

"Who did that?" he demanded of the medium.

The medium said the gay spirit was that of St. Peter.

But even this explanation did not satisfy Mr. Cross.

"Well, all I ask of St. Peter," he said, "is to materialize for just one minute and if I don't make a vacancy for a new gatekeeper I won't ask to get in."—Indianapolis News.

Willie—Sure. She's been engaged every evening since leap year started.

Good Marksmen.

A Yankee entered a hotel in the Highlands when he overheard a party of gentlemen speaking about shooting.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I guess I have seen some good shooting in my time. I have seen a fly killed on a flagpole at 300 yards."

An Irishman, who was one of the party, said: "Begorra, it's purty good, but I believe I've seen better. When I was in the army the major used to roll an empty beer barrel down the hill and every time the bunghole turned up we put a bullet in. Any man who couldn't do it was dismissed. I was in that corps for fifteen years and never saw a man dismissed."

Another Duty.

"You are my wife's social secretary?" he asks of the beauteous creature who is seated at the small desk in the study. "Yes, sir," she smiles. "I am supposed to take Mrs. Biirrup's piece in as many social details as possible."

"Well—er—she doesn't seem to be coming downstairs this morning, and it has always been her custom to kiss me good-by when I start for the office."—Judge.

WELCOME WORDS TO WOMEN
Women who suffer with disorders peculiar to their sex should write to Dr. Pierce and receive free the advice of a physician of over 40 years' experience—a skilled and successful specialist in the diseases of women. Every letter of this sort has the most careful consideration and is regarded as sacredly confidential. Many sensitively modest women write fully to Dr. Pierce what they would shrink from telling to their local physician. The local physician is pretty sure to say that he cannot do anything without "an examination." Dr. Pierce holds that these distasteful examinations are generally needless, and that no woman, except in rare cases, should submit to them.

Dr. Pierce's treatment will cure you right in the privacy of your own home. His "Favorite Prescription" has cured hundreds of thousands, some of them the worst of cases.

It is the only medicine of its kind that is the product of a regularly graduated physician. The only one good enough that its makers dare to print its every ingredient on its outside wrapper. There's no secrecy. It will bear examination. No alcohol and no habit-forming drugs are found in it. Some unscrupulous medicine dealers may offer you a substitute. Don't take it. Don't trifle with your health. Write to World's Dispensary Medical Association, Dr. R. V. Pierce, President, Buffalo, N. Y.—take the advice received and be well.

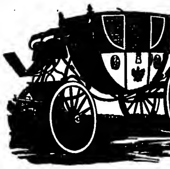
Washington's Real Name

By PROF. BERNARD J. CIGRAND

Copyright by W. G. Chapman

THE real name of the first president of the United States was not Washington. His baptismal name was George, and he was born February 22 in the year 1732. The old colony of Virginia was his birthplace, but the true name of his male ancestors was not Washington. This may seem a sweeping statement in the light of generally accepted history, but careful research has established beyond doubt that the ancient founder of the family from which came the Father of our Country was named William De Hertburn. The key to this apparent paradox lies in the fact that, in common with many noblemen and monarchs of Europe, the first president possessed an estate name and a real, or family name, the latter being known as the patronymic, or paternal name.

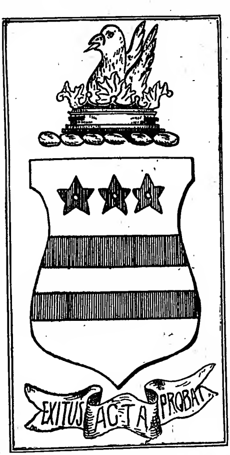
The first Washingtons were of French, and not English, origin, and were numbered among the powerful knights of the northern portion of France. When the Duke of Normandy conceived the ambition of becoming King of England he called to his aid the Catholics of France, and among those who responded to his appeal was an ancestor of George Washington. The duke gathered his soldiers about him and announced that by right and promise he deserved and intended to be the new King of England. His spirited address had the desired effect and the knights and their vassals thronged to the standard until there was soon gathered under the leadership of William, Duke of Normandy, the greatest army France had ever mustered, ready for the field and thirsting for the glories of conquest. Among the many banners thrown to the breeze appeared the shield of the multi-great-grandfather of our own George Washington. His name was William de Hertburn. The 60,000 followers of the duke set sail in 3,000 vessels of war for the English coast and landed without opposition, because of the English King Harold's conflict with the Norwegians in another part of his invaded domains. On October 14, 1066, the rival armies met, and on the field of Hastings took place one of the most terrific battles in the history of England. William of Normandy was the victor, and King Harold, with tens of thousands of his English, was among the slain. The victorious French marched to London, and on Christmas day they proclaimed their dashing leader "William I, Conqueror and King of England."



Washington's Crested Carriage.

King William, like all his French knights, loved the French ideals of government, church and home, and infused into the old English national and domestic life all the customs of his native land. Even the English language, which William never could learn, was gradually set aside, and among the loyal French knights who assisted the Conqueror in enforcing his reforms was the distant kin of George Washington. This early ancestor of our first president was numbered among the intimates of the King, and was one of the leaders of the French Conquest. In the past, American historians, possibly because of the strong influence upon literature exercised by England, placed the Washington ancestry as beginning in that country; but careful investigation bears out the statement that the Washingtons were of definite and direct French origin. They were French both in sentiment and training, and the original name was De Hertburn.

Naturally the question arises, why was the name changed, and what induced these faithful French subjects of William of Normandy to assume an English cognomen? The explanation is simple enough. William the Conqueror was a careful and far-seeing man. He realised that his usurpation of the English throne was a very radical departure in a governmental experiment, to say the least; and he was anxious to mould the people, whom he had made his vassals by dint of the strong hand, into as close duplicates of the French as possible. In other words, he strove to implant the French ideals into the English character as deeply as circumstances permitted. The complicated heraldic records found in the pages of the famous "Doomsday Book" is undoubtedly the best evidence that the King wished to make his radical campaign of permanent record, and hence a great number of men of education and ability were occupied in diligently surveying and noting all the land and water conditions of England. They also in these visitations made lengthy entries as to [illegible] estate [illegible] as well as an accurate record of the biographical and heraldic character of the new or French proprietors. And in this last seemingly unnecessary entry appears the statement that the brave, ever reliable Knight, Sir William De Hertburn, for military service to William I, be granted with feudal rights and power the extensive estate known as Wessyngton, and henceforth said Sir Knight shall be known as Sir William de Wessyington; but he shall still be a vassal of the bishop and his heraldic denomination shall continue to be, Arms: Argent, two bars gules (red); in chief, three mullets of the second. Crest: A raven with wings endorsed proper, issuing out of a ducal coronet or (gold)."

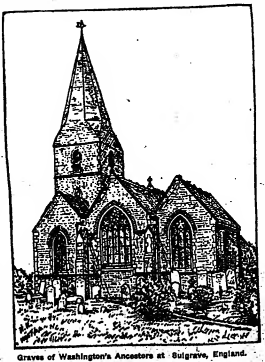


Washington's True Coat-of-Arms.

As a further demonstration of the importance of the De Herthurns, or "Wessyngtons," history furnishes the information that the estate in question was under the command of the Bishop of Durham, and situated in a locality exposed to the attack of the Scots of northern England. On this border there was constant warfare, and the king naturally selected the bravest and most warlike of his adherents to hold lands in the disputed district. For nine years this country between Durham and York was laid waste, and for ten years it was practically a desert, no man having the courage to attempt cultivation of the blasted fields or inhabit the ruined towns. One hundred thousand people died in this debatable strip of land, and there, where active hostilities ever reigned, the De Herthurns, or Wessyngtons, were stationed. This record of the great family is absolutely authentic in every detail, having been proved by minute research and personal visits to the locality where its members were lords of the soil—a task which embraced fifteen years of heraldic investigation.

Later the estate known as Wessyngton was spelled and entered officially as Wessington, the proprietors assuming the same name. Then it was recorded as Washington, and a natural change of the owner's name in accordance with that of his land followed. The proprietors became known as William, John, Lawrence, Robert and Nicholas De Washington. Finally the heraldic shields and French prefix of "De" was dropper, and the modern spelling of W-a-s-h-i-n-g-t-o-n prevailed.

The Washingtons were very prominent in the military as well as the civic phases of English life. In the days of Henry VIII, when that monarch was in conflict with the pope of Rome, Lawrence Washington sided with the king, and the latter confiscated the monasteries, convents and churches of the Roman Catholic church, giving to this Washington the Sulgrave estate, where for over a century the Washington family ruled supreme. A decline in their fortunes then appears to have taken place, for in 1620, the year the Pilgrims set sail for America, the Washingtons were practically driven from the Sulgrave estate to take up residence at Brighton with minor manors and holdings. The loss of the hundreds of acres of rich meadows and harvest fields was in a measure counteracted by the marriage of a Sir William Washington to a sister of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. This union brought about new alliances and affiliations which made Washingtons possible in America, and ultimately led to the rearing of George Washington to be the military leader of the colonies and eventually our first chief executive.



Graves of Washington's Ancestors at Sulgrave, England.

This marriage brought the Washington family into direct domestic social and court relationship with the prominent and powerful favorite of the then reigning monarch, and political circumstance destined the Washingtons to espouse the cause of the king, rather than the idol of the Commons—Oliver Cromwell. The Washingtons performed heroic services for the king, but when Cromwell proved victorious and seized the reins of government, they found England no longer a safe dwelling [illegible] the unhappy lot of the royalists, or King's Cavaliers; and rather than bow to one whom they looked upon as a usurper, many of the Washingtons fled to foreign lands. John and Lawrence, brothers, came to Virginia, the former being the grandfather of George Washington, the first president of the United States.

Among the distinguished Washingtons who escaped persecution by flight from England was one whose identity genealogists long sought vainly to verify—the brother of General George Washington's great grandfather. This Washington's name was James, and he fled to Rotterdam, Holland, where in 1650 he wedded Clara Vander Lanan, daughter of the mayor of the port. From this union was derived the present Dutch and German Washingtons a sturdy folk who adapted themselves to these governments under which they have held and are at present holding official positions of high station. One of these German Washingtons offered his services in a military capacity to the United States consul at Frankfort-on-Main in 1862. He expressed himself as anxious to enlist in the Union army, and presented the consul with a verified genealogical chart prepared from the records of the Dutch government. This gentleman was Baron de Washington. The statement has been certified by William W. Murphy, consul at that point, and attested by the Honorable Frederick Kapp, of New York City, who was visiting in Germany and wrote a letter in which the circumstances were fully described.

The original correspondence and data in my possession relating to the Dutch and German Washingtons prove the baron to have been a direct lineal descendant of the James Washington who landed in Holland in 1650. He married a Bavarian lady and held a certificate of honorable discharge showing that he had been a lieutenant in the Bavarian army. To obtain a commission as officer in the Federal army was [illegible] of this honor, and possibly because he deemed that sufficient respect had not been shown to one of such noted ancestry, he did not emigrate to the United States. However, before the interview was closed, he deposited with the American consul a certified genealogical chart on which the following appears:

"Baron de Washington is a direct descendant of the ancient and honorable Washington family of England; the earliest emigrant to Holland being James Washington, one of the four brothers of Stuart sympathisers (Charles I). James came to Holland in 1650, his two brothers emigrated to Virginia, and the third brother remained in England, where he was serving as a divine."

This remarkable bit of genealogical history gives the earliest and most authentic record of the Dutch and German Washingtons, of which there are many and of whom the church records abound in entries of marriages, births and deaths. Further investigation brings to light the fact that this earliest Dutch emigrant, James, was married in the English church of Rotterdam, all of which tends to corroborate that he was of English training. Baron de Washington was born in 1833, and his brother Max married the Duchess of Oldenburg and in this way became connected with one of the oldest sovereign families of Europe. The House of Oldenburg is the prime branch of the Holstein-Gottorp stock, which has given emperors to Russia and Kings to Denmark, and is prominently related to the present King of England, George V. And Jacob Washington was first lieutenant of the Dutch navy in 1845, this branch being related to the wealthy banking firm, Cornelius L. Keurenaur of The Hague. Upwards of seventy-five Washingtons are numbered among the inhabitants of Holland and Bavaria. Hence the Washingtons, in the farthest genealogical tracings, hail from France. We next find them in England and then in Holland and Bavaria.

Regarding the Washingtonian coat-of-arms some odd discoveries have also come to light. Quite contrary to our American belief the Washington shield does not contain "stars and stripes," notwithstanding that more than a thousand books and as many more published articles so proclaim it. The facts are that the Washington shield contains "bars and mullets (spurs of the Knight's boots". The earliest reference which I have been able to find which announces the Washington shield blazoned with stars and stripes, relates to a public banquet at Baltimore, Maryland, in 1851, where the ideas of an English poet—Martin Tupper by name—were voiced, proclaiming that the American flag, with its heraldic notions, was borrowed from the Washington shield, which possessed stars and stripes. Ever since this banquet American authors and orators have, without further investigation, accepted the statement as correct. The English poet was misled by his fervid fancy, for the Heralds' College at London, the highest authority on British heraldry, writes as follows: "A Washington shield with stars and stripes (pales) has never been of record." It is altogether probable that Tupper, as well as others, was deceived by the shape of the "mullets." These spurs, as worn by the knights of old, were round in form, resembling modern cog-wheels somewhat, and their bristling points possibly suggested the "stars" of which Tupper spoke.

Hundreds of writers have also announced that the crest on General George Washington's coast-of-arms is an eagle, and that this family emblem was the foundation of the suggestion that the eagle be the emblem of the American republic. While the crest may appear like an eagle, the facts are that the heraldic grant of arms to this Washington branch present a raven issuing from a golden ducal crown, the crest of the family. Furthermore, Washington himself clearly shows by correspondence with the Herald's office at London that it was not an eagle, and the letter is dated ten years after the eagle had become the emblem of the republic (June 20, [illegible] adelphia May 2, 1792, the third year of his presidency, and the package was sealed with the Washington family arms as is indicated in a letter which reads:

"The arms enclosed in your letter are the same that are held by the family here; though I have also seen, and have used, as you may perceive by the seal to this packet, a flying griffin for the crest."

The Washington crest, "a raven issuing from a ducal coronet, gold," was evidently given because of the sportsmanship of the early English Washingtons. In fact the crow, falcon and hawk have been for more than four hundred years the emblem of sport. The pastime of hawking was engaged in only by the wealthy and the Washingtons were noted for their love of hunting and sporting. Benson J. Loesing lent some color to the foregoing conclusion when he wrote of the English Washingtons:

"For more than two hundred years the De Wessyngtons, or Washingtons, were conspiring after their kind (robber knights) fighting, hawking, carousing and gaming."

This grant of the raven was in 1500, at about the same time that hawking was at its height as a sport, for at about the same period we find that in Spain the son of Columbus attempted to prove that his father was of aristocratic and also of heraldic family in that "he was of a people who kept their own hawks." This alone, in those days, stamped the man as a falconer, as only people of high social standing were permitted by license to engage in that enjoyment; hence a raven, a falcon, a crow or a hawk on the shield or crest indicated prominence. This sporty and hunting disposition of the Washingtons was distinctly manifested in the Washingtons of Virginia, of which our first president also gave liberal expression.

There are five distinct Washington shields, but in the heraldic records they are pronounced of the same origin, as follows:

A silver (argent) shield upon which are two red (gules) bars; in the top (chief) three red mullets (spurs of knights' boots).

A red (gules) shield with a single white (silver) bar charged with three mullets.

Ancient Washington Shield.

A red shield with a white bar upon which are three cinquefoilies, also red.

A red shield with two bars white, in chief three martlets.

A shield of four bars, white and red, three mullets.

A shield in green, a lion rampant in white, within a border gobonated white and blue.

These constituted the heraldic arms of all Washington people as recorded in the English College of Heralds.

Washington was fond of genealogical investigations, and in the College of Heralds can be seen a score or more of pages he wrote at various times in his eager search after family arms and crests. He was proud of his heraldic ancestors, and this family estimate is well expressed in the frequency with which he blazoned the Washington shields upon his choice tokens and valuables.

Many such instances may be noted in his heraldic watch charms, his several personal seals; the doors of his carriages; the porcelain of his dinner set; the silver ware of his liquor service; the fireplace and the mirrors; the picture frames and his library walls; his bookplate and his saddle, and practically everything upon which a family signature or shield might be engraved, painted or printed.

The illness of Sir Isaac Heard, the head of the English department of hereldry, closed the correspondence relating to Washington's eager attempt to prepare a Washington genealogy and origin and evolution of the family coat-of-arms. This interesting correspondence has never yet been scripturally reproduced, and it is to be regretted that a continuance of the investigation was disturbed by illness, since many disputed biographical problems would doubtless have been solved.

The man who is doing good work is writing his name on the memory of the world. Stone monuments are only seen by a very few, no odds how high they may be built.

Where all men are not allowed a hand in making the laws that govern them, they are slaves. They must bow to the dictates of other men and have

INNOCENT MAN IS PARDONED

New Yorker Serves Year in Federal Prison for Crime He Did Not Commit.

New York.—Pardoned by President Taft after serving one year in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta for a crime he did not commit, Oscar Krueger, a decorator, rejoined his wife and five-year-old son in their home, at No. 312 East 125th street, the other day. Mr. Krueger, upon whom the disgrace of his conviction, although innocent, had weighed heavily throughout the period of his imprisonment, is in ill health, due to nervous collapse.

Mr. Krueger says that his conviction was partly, if not wholly, due to the activity of Anthony Comstock, secretary of the Society of the Suppression of Vice. Mr. Krueger rehearsed the story of his unhappiness from the day, thirteen months ago, when he was accosted in the street by a young woman who asked him if his name was "Ed." He answered in the negative, end, to prove his assertion, he showed her his bankbook which bore his name. While the woman was holding Mr. Krueger's attention Mr. Comstock stood on the opposite side of the street, and after Mr. Krueger and the woman separated Mr. Comstock followed Mr. Krueger to the Bowery Savings bank, where he learned his address. A few days later Mr. Krueger was arrested and after a speedy trial convicted and sent to Atlanta.

Oscar Krueger.

"I was dazed," said Krueger. "I knew I was innocent and I could not understand why that court and jury did not think so, too. When the doors of the prison closed behind me weeks passed before I was able to realize the horror of my position. I wrote my wife and assured her of my innocence, but she had faith in me and needed no assurance of mine. So she began to plan my freedom. She and my sister took up my fight and an investigation of my case was made by order of the Department of Justice at Washington. My innocence was established and I regained my freedom."

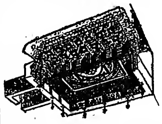
Krueger was convicted on the charge of using the mails for improper purposes.

HEAT FOR ANCIENT ROME

House Heating Apparatus Just Found Demonstrates How People Kept Warm 2,000 Years Ago.

London.—The discovery of extensive Roman remains at Great Chesters, on the Tyne, has demonstrated that the Romans 2,000 years ago enjoyed a much better system of heating houses than Englishmen do at the present time.

By the Roman system the heat was distributed evenly throughout the walls and floors of the house, whereas the usual British system is an open fire at which your face roasts while your back freezes, and you are liable to die of cold if you go into the corners of the room or the passages of the house.



Basement of Old Roman House.

In one of the houses of Great Chesters there is a beautiful example of a hypocaust, the name of the Roman heating apparatus. Great Chesters was the site of an important Roman military station along the great wall which the Emperor Hadrian built to keep back the barbarians, descending on Britain from Scotland. The house was that of the Roman military commander.

Hot air was generated by a circular furnace, which heated water and gave out streams of hot air into the hypocaust, which was a chamber under the ground floor of the house, containing arrangements of hollow tile pillars called "suspensura."

From the hypocaust the hot air was distributed throughout the building by a series of wall and floor flues, giving an even temperature throughout the house.

This system was invented shortly before the time of the Emperor Augustus, who reigned from 27 B. C. to 14 A. D., and was soon adopted not only in public baths, but in private houses.

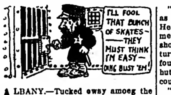
Police Chief Escapes from Own Prison



I'LL FOOL THAT BUNCH OF SKATES — THEY MUST THINK I'M EASY — DING BUST 'EM!

ALBANY.—Tucked away among the hills in the northern part of Westchester county, the little town of Hillside, with its 100 voters, the smallest incorporated village in the state, is excited with a criminal and political sensation that would delight the soul of the late Sir William S. Gilbert of comic opera fame.

Political activity in Hillside goes by inverse ratio to the town's size. Leaders of the opposing factions are Hewson Stephenson, chief of police when he is not doing odd jobs of painting, and the police justice, William Stage.

Stephenson was making his usual tour of duty the other night when he spied a shaft of light through the closed shutters of the room above Henry Fry's saloon.

"Ho! A poker game," he muttered, as he stole silently up the rear stairs. He could hear voices in lively argument behind the door. He braced his shoulder to force it, but when he turned the handle it yielded and he found himself confronting 20 familiar but not friendly faces. Also he encountered a heavy silence.

"Have you a warrant to serve?" coldly inquired Mr. Stage, the justice of the peace, who sat at the head of the table. Stephenson shook his head. "Then I order your arrest for unlawful entry," continued the justice. "Constable, do your duty."

The constable stood up and placed his hand on the police chief's shoulder.

"Now, I'll commit you to jail under $2,000 bail," the justice went on. The caucus adjourned to escort the victim to the town lock up. The constable saw that his chief was tucked safely in a cell. He locked the jail door and went back to the meeting.

"Five minutes later the chief took a key out of his pocket, unlocked his cell, calmly "broke jail," and went home to bed.

"Social Queen" Found to Be Butcher

WHEELING, W. VA.—A bundle of blood-stained butchers' aprons, an electric washing machine, a "bridge" party and a bucket of water have started a domestic and industrial warfare here in which are involved Thomas Yingling, millionaire wholesale meat dealer, and his wife, would-be social dictator.

It is because of them that Mrs. Yingling has resigned her efforts to dictate to Wheeling society and has announced her intention of spending a million which she possesses in her own right to put her husband "out of business."

The story of the split between the Yinglings will be told here for years. Mrs. Yingling has long aspired to social leadership, and was partly successful. She had planned a series of receptions and dances for this winter and informed her husband he must don his evening clothes and help her entertain.

He did not approve, and Mrs. Yingling started to do the entertaining herself.

MARKET
IF THAT HUSBAND OF MINE GETS TOO GAY I'LL—I'LL—WELL I'LL FIX HIM

The first affair she planned was a party for the Euterpe club. An elaborate musical program was given, attended by most of Wheeling's elect. This over, the guests sat down to bridge.

Then Mr. Yingling appeared in his shirt sleeves. He carried a washing machine in one hand and in the other a basket of dirty clothes.

Mr. Yingling calmly attached the washing machine to an electric chandelier, carried in a bucketful of water, and began to wash the dirty clothes. The guests screamed and departed.

The result was her announcement that she intended to become a business rival of her husband.

Goes to Prison to Join His Brother

CHARLEY WILL BE GLAD TER SEE ME !!!
OH YES — HE'LL BE TICKLED TO SEE YOU —

KANSAS CITY.—It wouldn't be true, perhaps, to say that James Baughman capered with delight when the judge of Wyandotte county common pleas court gave him a little package that was coming to him the other afternoon. But he took the bundle, unwrapped it and examined the contents —ten to twenty years in the penitentiary for highway robbery. And then he smiled.

"I'll tell you why I don't mind it so much," the convicted man said. "Charley's up there —my brother Charley. And it's my fault he is. He took a chance for me and lost. I'm going to ask 'em if they won't let me work alongside of him. I don't care what kind of work it is, so as they let us serve our time together.

"When I got pinched for sticking up those two guys I sent for Charley and he came.

"'Get me out of this,' I says.

"'I can't do it, Jim,' he told me. 'The bond is too much. I don't know where I can get that pile of money.'

"It was my first time in jail, and it was a terror to me. I couldn't stand it. I cried and begged and pleaded with him for God's sake to do something to get me out. It made him feel pretty bad, I guess, to hear me act the kid, that way. He looked at me hard and

"'Jim, I will,' he says.

"Three days after that they pinched him as he was getting off a train in Argentine. He had his pockets full of stuff that he had stolen from several stores in Olathe the night before. He was bringing it here to sell it so he could raise the price of my bond.

"They took Charley back to Olathe. They had the goods on him. He couldn't do anything but plead guilty and they sent him up again.

"Say, do you think they'll let us work together up there?"

Meanest Man Is Found by a Minister

NEW YORK.—When it comes to depriving the minister of his wedding fee, the "meanest man" may be plural, but when it comes to not only "doing" the minister, but to soliciting a job from him afterward, the Rev. Lincoln Hollister Caswell is convinced the meanest man lives in Flatbush.

The Rev. Mr. Caswell also lives in Flatbush, where he is pastor of the Fenimore Street Methodist Episcopal church. A few weeks ago the Rev. Mr. Caswell was approached by a young man who confided he wished to be married and wished the minister to tie the knot.

About 200 guests were present at the church on the day appointed, and the bridegroom was a sight more gorgeous than Solomon in all his glory, for he appeared in brilliant tan shoes and yellow gloves, colorful scarf and clothes to match. The bride was attired in a plain traveling costume of tan.

They stood at the altar while the minister read the marriage service

AH-HEM- YOU KNOW —I WILL BE A LITTLE SHORT 'TIL AFTER TH' HONEYMOON !!!!-

end until the time for the presentation of the ring arrived. Then the bride, thinking that the marriage was concluded, insisted on clasping her husband around the neck and showering him with kisses, to his confusion and to the dismay of the minister.

However, the latter managed to convey to her a delicate hint that the services were not yet concluded, and the marriage was finally performed. At the conclusion the bridegroom led the minister aside, and, in a confidential manner, apprised him he would be short of money until after the honeymoon trip, and requested him to wait until that time for his fees. To this the minister consented.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

STRONG MAN OF FRANCE

Raymond Poincaire, the new prime minister, is one of the most interesting figures in the French republic. In him are combined all that one understands by French culture, dignity and charm of manner, added to a reputation of stern integrity that is nationwide.

This is the third time that the French Academy has supplied the third republic with a prime minister. The first was the duke of Broglie in 1873, and the second was M. de Freycinet in 1890.

Poincaire comes to power with ripe ideas on the subject of government. He once expressed the triple wish, which may be taken as the key to his attitude, that deputies would legislate without attempting to govern, that ministers would govern on their own responsibility and that justice should know no politics.

The new premier's versatility is to a considerable degree a matter of family influence, for his father, uncle, elder brother and cousin have all been distinguished in science and literature, and, as was said by Lavisse when Poincaire was introduced into the academy, they might be said to constitute a little family university all by themselves.

BIG LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

The largest amount of life insurance held by any woman in the world is now carried by Mrs. Charles Netcher, head of a Chicago department store.

Mrs. Netcher has just taken out a life insurance policy for $200,000, which raises her total insurance to $1,200,000, more than that of any other person in Chicago, it was announced.

Mrs. Netcher has followed a platform of her husband, who, when he died in 1904, was insured for $500,000.

After the death of her husband, Mrs. Netcher assumed control of the store and has conducted the business ever since, building it up and constantly increasing her holdings in real estate as the profits from her business increased.

She soon became what is known in insurance circles as "a good risk." When she decided to take out large policies on her life the various companies extended to her the usual rights allowed business men. And, according to the Chicago executive representative of a big eastern company, who has written her insurance, it is uncommon for a woman to be allowed the same rights as a man in the writing of large policies.

WIFE OF LEADING SOCIALIST

The Hon. Victor Berger of Milwaukee is the first Socialist in congress and his wife deserves attention as an educator and reformer. Since her arrival in Washington, when Mr. Berger took his seat in April, she has been busy studying social conditions at the capital as if she were a member of the house committee for the District. She visits the schools and learns their needs, and many a Washington pupil will have her to thank for some needed improvement. In appearance, Mrs. Berger is a typical German-American woman, of the type one imagines in a comfortable home, busy superintending the children and presiding over a breakfast table. Yet there is another side to her character. She is an earnest reformer, who has taken such an active part in political work in Milwaukee that she has been elected a member of the board of education, and has helped to put into execution such ideas as penny luncheons, teaching sanitation in the schools, and giving girls lessons in dress-making and millinery. Most of the children of the public schools have to drop their studies at fourteen or sixteen, in order to learn a trade; and Mrs. Berger believes that it should be made possible for them to complete later in life the education which early work prevented.—Family Magazine.

ABDUL HAMID STILL ALIVE

Abdul Hamid is alive! The former sultan is in Salonica and has not been secretly conveyed to Constantinople.

Those are the replies to two recently circulated reports which have told of the former sultan's demise and of his having been spirited away during the night to the capital. The latter report was merely founded upon the passage of a train full of munitions, concerning which quite special precautions were taken.

If you want to set yourself a difficult task it is in going to Salonica and trying there to find out some details concerning the physical condition and mode of life of the deposed sultan, who for so many years was the political chess player who kept the diplomatists of Europe busy, and who was so skilled in the game that he usually saw 20 moves ahead, while the ambassadors at Constantinople saw but two or three.

Abdul Hamid in his confinement as the prisoner of his people is enveloped in much the same mystery as he was in Yildiz Kiosk at Constantinople, and rumors and reports unlimited circulate concerning him—most of them inventions, a very few approaching the truth.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Highest Paid Woman Official in U. S.

YES MUM
1000 5000 BILLS
BETTER RUN OFF A MILLION NICKELS, A MILLION DIMES —

WASHINGTON. — Some misguided men in the United States have the idea that their wives boss their incomes, salaries or wages—different words to use in proportion to the amount they receive. This money they receive in bills or coin. The person legally responsible for it is the secretary of the treasury of the United States, who is charged with making all of Uncle Sam's money. But, getting down to real facts, it is somebody else who bosses all the money—Miss Margaret V. Kelly, Uncle Sam's highest paid woman official.

She gets $5,000 a year. She is assistant director of the mint. Actually the secretary of the treasury has little to do with our coin. Miss Kelly attends to that. There are but four persons between her and the secretary of the treasury, and in their absence she runs things.

Miss Kelly is a native of New Hampshire, a producer of Boston educational institutions.

As assistant director of the mint Miss Kelly holds such a high official position in the treasury department that it can be truly said that there has never been her equal in the service.

To see her some day acting secretary of the treasury of the United States is no stretch of the imagination, for, if the secretary and the two assistant secretaries, the comptroller of the currency and the treasurer of the United States were to be absent themselves at the same time, and Miss Kelly were then acting director of the mint, it would be "Margaret V. Kelly, Acting Secretary, Treasury Department."

No Hereditary Descent in Politics

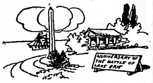
THE passing of great baronial houses in politics is stimulated by the last elections. Another blow has been delivered to the practice in several instances of handing the senatorial toga from father to son. State Senator Arthur P. Gorman, Democrat, of Maryland, was only running for governor to be sure, but it was generally recognized that had he been elected he would soon have become a formidable candidate for the United States senate, where his father of the same name served for many years. The late Senator Gorman started his only son upon a political career by reason of his influence with the state machine, and undoubtedly looked ahead to the day when the son would become a senator.

The Gormans are related to the Davises and Elkinses, of West Virginia, a neighboring state. All three families made considerable money in the same ventures, but not all their money for the late Senator Gorman died a millionaire, the late Senator S. B. Elkins, Republican, died a multi-millionaire, and ex-Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, cousin of Gorman and father-in-law of Elkins, is the richest of them all and close to 90 years old. Young Davis Elkins got into the United States senate a few days last spring on a Gubernatorial appointment, prior to the assembling of the legislature.

Last elections in Maine dashed high hopes for another family succession in the senate. The Maine voters understood pretty well that if Col. Fred Hale had not slipped up on his ambition to get into congress from the First district he would speedily have gone into training for the senate, and had Maine stayed Republican the organization, of which his father, now ex-Senator Hale, was head, would have had a toga waiting for him.

Similarly, over in Vermont, where for a season the late Senator Redfield Proctor held the state as in the hollow of his hand, all the plans had been laid for a senatorial succession from father to son. It proceeded as far as the election of the son to be governor of Vermont, but no further.

Plan Celebration of Perry's Battle



ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF LAKE ERIE

A TENTATIVE design for the Perry memorial to be erected in 1913 at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, in memory of the one hundredth anniversary of Commodore Perry's battle on Lake Erie has been selected here by the joint board, composed of the state boards of nine states which are to participate in the erection of the memorial. The architect has been employed and preparations begun for a celebration which is to last from July 4, 1913, to October 1 of the same year and is to be participated in by almost every city in the Great Lakes.

J. Friedlander of New York was selected for architect, his suggestion for the memorial being accepted as the most satisfactory of 54 submitted. It will be subject to modification, but in $1,250, $1,000 and $750 each were the main will be erected as proposed by Mr. Friedlander. Premiums of awarded to the second, third and fourth designs, according to their merit as seen by the board.

The memorial is to consist of a plain shaft 330 feet high, erected near the shore of Lake Erie, at a point off which the battle was fought. There is to be a terrace or plaza leading down to the water's edge and on one side will be erected the historical museum, while another is to a memorial building to commemorate the 100 years of peace. The estimated cost of the memorial is $500,000.

As part of the celebration the Niagara, the old flagship of Commodore Perry, which is sunk in Erie harbor, will be raised and made seaworthy. It will then be taken to each of the more prominent of the lake cities during next summer for a stay of a few days in each one.

Fraud Promoters Enriched by Millions

"FROM the final reports submitted by inspectors covering the arrests for the fiscal year it has been ascertained that the promoters of fraudulent schemes who have been put out of business during the past year have obtained approximately $77,000,000 from the public."

This is the astonishing statement made in the annual report of R. S. Sharp, chief postoffice inspector. It will probably be incredible to the average person that there are enough "easy marks" in the United States to contribute $77,000,000 to operators of "get-rich-quick" projects, but, according to the chief inspector, this amount does not represent nearly all that went into the pockets of swindlers. The $77,000,000 is the profits of those who have been caught, and does not take in those who are still operating.

"These fraudulent schemes," said Chief Inspector Sharp, "cover a wide field and are of endless variety, from the simplest business transaction to a gigantic project involving the sale of

PEOPLE WUZ MADE TER GET STUNG — worthless stock in fake mining companies and fictitious institutions existing only on paper or in the minds of the promoters.

"The result of the year's work has developed the fact that these fraud manipulators are a distinct class of criminals, some moving in the highest social and business circles, but nearly all having more or less affiliations and connection with or are advisors with schemes or enterprises of illegitimate character in which they are known as promoters."

During the fiscal year 1911 628 individuals were indicted on charges of using the mail in furtherance of schemes to defraud.

COMMERCIAL AVIATION.

Carrying passengers and freight in airships as a definite transportation enterprise is perhaps a long way off, but significant of the faith of men in the possibilities of commercial aviation is the formal incorporation of a company in New Jersey for this purpose, says the Washington Herald. The expressed intention of the incorporators set forth in the articles of incoration is the "building and operation of and the carriage of passengers and freight in aeroplanes." As frequently pointed out, the science and practice of aviation is making remarkable progress. By means of the dirigible airship and the hydro-aeroplane experts have begun to see that it will be possible some time to use the air as a means of transit, much as the earth is now employed for that purpose. As bearing upon the question of realizing this end, it is only necessary to consider that the evolution of the locomotive and steamship has been slow; that it has taken many years to bring the trolley car to perfection, and that the automobile is at least a quarter of a century old as a practical road machine. Fast as the airmen have progressed with their inventions and experiments, we need not expect much greater advancement in a less period of time than has been the case with vehicles running on land and through the seas.

The entire property of Illinois is reported to be $2,318,333,241. If that were divided among the people each one would get $411.11. Where in ten years from now would that per capita be? It would undoubtedly undergo a great change. A few men would have $500,000 of it, a few more $100,000 of it; many more $50,000, and so on until we get to the point where very many men wouldn't have 15 cents. How can we account for this wonderful change? For various reasons. Some men are smarter than others, some more diligent, some more frugal, some more temperate. These facts can explain why this $411 per capita has disappeared. While the circumstances, the environment, the vicissitude may account for some of the change, most of the change can be referred to the man himself—his character, his habit, his disposition, his appetite—under the influences of which, if had, that $411 vanishes and reappears in the hands of the man who has been sober, diligent, frugal and wide awake.

Gossip in Great Britain continues to wag its tongue over the reported coolness between King George and the Gaekwar of Baroda. The story persists that at the durbar everyone was astonished at the Gaekwar's appearance in a black frock coat, while the other princes wore their native robes and marvelous gems. The queen, it is said, gave the Gaekwar a frozen stare and the king merely nodded. The Gaekwar responded with a curter nod, turned his back and made a distinct grimace. It is asserted that his punishment, aside from forcing an apology, will be that of cutting down his royal salute of twenty-one guns and classing him as a second-rate ruler. Anglo-Indians consider this dangerous, and believe the incident would better have been ignored, on account of the Gaekwar's great wealth and popularity among his subjects.

Urotropin is the name of the drug which Dr. Simon Flexner of the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research declares to be an antidote for infantile paralysis. The dread disease has carried off thousands of victims, and if Dr. Flexner's cure proves to be all that is claimed for it, that alone will entitle the doctor and the Rockefeller institute to be famous for all time to come.

A dramatic society is advertising the revival of hissing in the theaters as a mark of disapprobation of plays. But the present deadly silence of disapproval is more significant than any amount of hissing, besides much more civil and civilized.

GOOD ROADS BILL

BOB DUNN'S PROPOSED STATUTE IS TO TAKE PLACE OF ACT FATHERED BY ELWELL.

COUNTIES ON EQUALITY.

Does Away With Assessment of Private Property—Said by Lawyers to Be Constitutional.

A new road law, designed to take the place of the Elwell act enacted by the last Legislature and to overcome some of the objections to that bill, has been framed by R. C. Dunn of Princeton, author of the 1-mill tax and other road bills, and was outlined by him last night.

"The trouble with the Elwell act is that it is unworkable, even if it is constitutional, which many doubt," said Mr. Dunn. "Another big trouble with it is that the northern counties have made so many applications for state aid under that law that the southern counties fear they will not get their just share, and on this account it will endanger the adoption of the 1-mill tax amendment at the election next fall.

"My bill, first of all, would amend the present law so that the minimum to be given any county from the state road and bridge fund will be 1 per cent, instead of one-half of 1 per cent as it is now. As there are eighty-six counties in the state, that would leave 14 per cent of the fund to be divided among some of the larger counties, like Stearns, Ottertail and others, that are most deserving of state aid.

Provides Two Methods.

"The bill does away with the assessment of private property provided in the Elwell law. It provides two methods of building a road. The first is where two or more townships decide they want a road. A petition of 20 per cent of the freeholders of those towns will be required, and then the county commissioners request the highway commission to survey the proposed road and estimate the cost. When the cost is ascertained the towns, at the annual election or a special election, may vote bonds to pay 25 per cent of the cost which they will be required to pay. They will be payable to the county and may run, say, ten or fifteen years. The county then issues its bonds for the whole amount, the state to pay the county 50 per cent of the cost and the county to pay the remaining 25 per cent.

"Supposing the cost of the road is $100,000. The state would pay the county $5,000 for a period of ten years. If the 1-mill tax is adopted each county would get at least $12,000 a year, which would leave $7,000 for roads in other parts of the county. As the county pays for this road by bonds it would leave the county road and bridge fund to be used for laterals and other work.

"On the other hand, if a road is proposed going the entire length of the county, the county may assume the whole cost and pay 50 per cent, while the state pays 50. Where the county pays half, the matter would have to be submitted to all the voters in the county, but where the county only pays one-fourth the county board can issue the bonds when the towns have voted to issue their share.

Directs Sale of Bonds Held by State.

"Another provision of the bill is that it authorizes and directs the state board of investment to sell, as fast as needed, the bonds of other states now held by our trust funds and loan this money to the counties at 4 per cent. The state holds about $6,000,000 of these bonds now and gets an average of about 3½ per cent. It would get 4 per cent from the counties and have just as good security, and the bill provides that these bonds of other states shall not be sold for less than par and accrued interest.

"This bill does not affect private property as the Elwell bill does, and I have conferred with the attorney general's department and other lawyers, and they say it is constitutional beyond a doubt. The bill will make it possible for every county to have one or two roads traversing its entire length in about two years. The bill will require that they be rock or gravel surfaced and also that they shall be continuous. The bill also limits the indebtedness which any county or town may incur to 10 per cent of the assessed real estate valuation, while the Elwell bill did not fix any limit.

"The state will deal only with the county and will be fair to all of them, because each county must have its 1 per cent of the fund. No law on earth can compel all the counties in one stretch to join in building a road from St. Paul to the northern border for instance, but with these roads all over, they will naturally connect anyway."

Bovey Man Declares They Can Be Picked Out By Hand.

Bovey.—Frank Levalley, a homesteader living ten miles north of the village, on Lawrence lake, came to town with a ton of fish. He states the fish were caught by hand, and were taken from a lake near his home. He cut a hole in the ice, and fish by the thousands crowded to the hole and were ready to be taken out.

CONFESSES DOUBLE MURDER

JACOB DOEFFLER ADMITS CRIME AT RED WING, MINN.

Killed Anton Schill and His Wife, Farmers—Exonerates Other Prisoners.

Red Wing. — Jacob Doeffler, Jr., self-confessed murderer of Anton Schill and his wife, Theresa Schill, Doeffler on Feb. 11, in the presence of Sheriff P. J. Lundquist, County Attorney Wm. M. Ericson, Coroner R. L. C. Gelb, Chief of Police Sevarson and Deputy Sheriff John Anderson, made a full and complete confession. He says he committed the crimes all alone, and that Victor Artz and Karl Kehren, now under arrest charged with stealing Schill's cattle, are not implicated in the double murder.

After sending a rifle ball crashing through Anton Schill's brain, in the barn, Doeffler went into the house and took Mrs. Schill's life in a similar manner. The woman's body was dragged into the cellar of the house and was covered with her husband's coat.

Schill's body was buried in the ground underneath a manure pile. All efforts to locate his body having proved futile until Sunday. It was found in the place described by Doeffler in his confession to the officers.

The confession unravels the most fiendish and mysterious murder ever committed in this county. The authorities, since the finding of Mrs. Schill's body, worked diligently on the case against Doeffler, who at the inquest of Mrs. Schill testified as to purchasing Schill's horse, cattle, and chickens, and having taken them to his farm in Pierce county, Wisconsin, about eight miles from Red Wing.

Doeffler claimed that he had purchased the hay and fodder from Schill and on Jan. 17 he defied the order of Coroner Gelb, and removed the property from the farm. He was immediately placed under arrest, and Victor Artz, who also assisted him in the work, was held. Since that time both men and Karl Kehren, arrested later on a similar charge, have been sweated for hours at a time.

Doeffler's confession which is in writing, according to the authorities, will not be made public until his trial begins.

BOOSTERS IN CASS LAKE.

Dr. D. F. Dumas, President, to Preside at Pine River Meeting.

Cass Lake.—The program for the convention of the Cass County Development Association to be held at Pine River, Minn., on Friday, March [illegible] has been issued. The meeting will be called to order by Dr. D. F. Dumas, president of the association and mayor of Cass Lake. The address of welcome will be delivered by Mayor Bowman, of Pine River, Minnesota. Other addresses will be as follows:

"The Northern Minnesota Development Association," F. J. McPortlin, county attorney, Koochiching county.

"What the Legislature of 1911 Did for Northern Minnesota," C. H. Warner, member of the legislature, Fifty-second district.

"The Immigration Commission of the Northern Minnesota Development Association," A. G. Wedge, Jr., treasurer of the immigration commission.

"What Shall We Do to Develop the Resources of Cass County?" B. L. Perry, member of board of county commissioners, Cass county.

"Trunk Line Roads," C. M. King, president of the Northern Minnesota Development Association.

"The Relation of Good Roads to Development," P. V. Coppernell, attorney, Park Rapids.

"The Northern Minnesota Editorial Association," F. A. Dare, president of the Northern Minnesota Editorial Association.

"Cass County," William M. Wood, attorney, Cass Lake.

"Results of Development," P. H. McGarry, member of 1909 legislature.

"The State Fair Exhibit of Cass County, Minnesota, for 1912," George J. Silk, manager of 1912 Cass county state fair exhibit.

Pine River citizens will meet the delegates at the train with the band, and the Pine River orchestra will furnish music at the recesses of the convention.

FREED IN TAR CASE.

Jury in Glenville Riot Action Acquits Flusek After Being Out An Hour.

Albert Lea.—Frank Flusek, the first of eleven defendants to be tried in the Glenville tarring case, was acquitted, the jury returning a verdict after deliberating a little more than an hour.

The other ten cases, in which Dr. Freeman, of Glenville, is the complaining witness, will not be tried at present, but there is a probability that another case may be called in March, if any more ever come to trial.

CHOPS HIS FROZEN FOOT.

Settler Crazed With Pain Attempts to Amputate Member.

Duluth. — Crazed with the pain of a frozen foot, Andrew Hiltinen, a settler at Pike River, about seven miles from Tower, chopped off half the foot with an ax and he may lose his life as a result. He is in a critical condition at a hospital in Tower. When found the injured man had suffered great loss of blood. The injured foot will be amputated.

LISTS LANDSEEKER

IMMIGRATION COMMISSION DECIDES ON PLAN TO SPREAD INFORMATION.

WIDELY DISTRIBUTED.

Commissioner Maxfield Also Instructed to Try to Obtain Homeseekers' Rates from Railroads.

St. Paul.—The state immigration commission has decided upon an innovation in an effort to satisfy a demand which has existed for a long time. Hereafter the immigration bureau will print monthly a list of the names of all persons that have sent inquiries to the commission regarding Minnesota lands. These lists will be sent to all county auditors, city clerks and village recorders in the state and also to any Commercial club that asks for them through its president and secretary. These lists are to be kept on file for the use of any one who wants to sell Minnesota land.

Ever since H. J. Maxfield became immigration commissioner, he has been studying the matter, trying to devise some means by which real estate agents and others can procure the names that come to the commission.

Some Rejected Propositions.

One suggestion was to print the lists monthly and send copies to all real estate agents and others who asked for them. Mr. Maxfield thought, however, that this might necessitate the printing of 40,000 or 50,000 lists a month, and that the expenses would be too great for the department's appropriation. Another proposition was to send the lists only to those who would agree to use them only for the purpose of sending literature regarding Minnesota land. The objection made to the first suggestion was that agents for Canadian lands or land in the Western States would make use of lists of prospects that Minnesota had paid for. Another objection was that the real estate men would be favored to the exclusion of farmers who might want to sell land directly.

Real estate men who wish to copy the entire list and circularize the prospects may do so, while the man who has just one farm to sell can pick out a few names of possible purchasers and write them personal letters.

Mr. Maxfield was instructed also to confer with the railroad officials with a view to procuring homeseekers' excursion rates to Minnesota. It was reported at the meeting that the Great Northern will put in excursion rates to points North and West of Sauk Center and Benson after March 1, and efforts will be made to have the other railroads make special rates. During the last four or five years the homeseekers' rates to Minnesota have been cut off.

The meeting was attended by Ralph W. Wheelock, representing the Governor; Secretary of State Schmahl, State Auditor Iverson and A. E. Nelson of Minneapolis, members of the board, and Immigration Commissioner Maxfield.

EDITORS IN MILL CITY.

Annual Gathering of the Minnesota Association.

Minneapolis. — Minneapolis entertained the forty-sixth annual convention of the Minnesota Editorial association Thursday and Friday of last week. More than 200 editors attended. A feature of the meeting was a dinner given at the Commercial club dining room Thursday night, this being the first function given an outside gathering by the newly organized Minneapolis Civic and Commerce association. Thursday night the visiting newspaper men and their wives were given an opportunity to see "The Balkan Princess" at the Shubert as guests of printers' supplies dealers of the city.

The convention opened with an address of welcome by Mayor Haynes and a response by S. Y. Gordon, president of the association. Thursday afternoon James Tawney delivered an address on "World's International Peace." Theodore Christianson of the Dawson Sentinel read a paper on "The Editorial Page," and E. E. McCrea of the Alexander Post-News read a paper on "The Front Page." E. H. Denu of the Bemidji Pioneer delivered an address on "Advertising in a Country Paper."

Friday, H. V. Jones of the Minneapolis Journal spoke on "Second Class Postage" and J. C. Morrison of the Morris Tribune read a paper on "Cost System of Printing." Discussions, resolutions, reports of committees and election of officers followed.

Farm Sells at $100 an Acre.

Faribault.—The James Murphy farm west of here was sold recently for $16,000. The farm comprises 160 acres and was purchased by James Murphy in 1870 for $1,500 from George Mills. At that time that was considered a good price for the farm. It has now been sold for $100 an acre without a cent being spent upon the land for building improvements. Not more than one-half of the land is cleared of the original growth of timber, much of which is of hardwood.

J. J. HILL BEAT TRUST

INFORMS STANLEY COMMITTTEE OF GREAT ORE LAND DEAL.

Declares He Gave Property Worth More Than $4,000,000 to His Associates.

Washington.—J. J. Hill, chairman of the board of directors of the Great Northern railroad, testified before the house steel trust investigating committee.

Mr. Hill's testimony was designed to throw light on the so-called Hill lease of the Lake Superior ore fields to the United States Steel corporation, a lease which was recently ordered to be canceled, in 1915.

Mr. Hill told the committee how, out of his own pocket, he had bought $4,000,000 worth of ore and railroad property on the Mesaba Range, how he had engineered the lease with the United States Steel corporation, by the terms of which the trust was unmercifully "chiseled," paying $1.02 per ton for ore while independents paid other companies between 15 and 47 cents; how he had turned over the Mesaba properties and half a dozen other concerns to the Lake Superior company, limited, thus keeping inside the Sherman act, and how the profits of the Lake Superior company had afterwards been turned into the Great Northern Ore company, whose stock was distributed share for share among the shareholders of the Great Northern Railway company.

BOLD ROBBERY IN NEW YORK

Bandits Hold Up Bank Messengers Near Wall Street and Get Off With $25,000.

New York.—Twenty-five thousand dollars in currency was stolen from a taxicab in the heart of the financial district by three highwaymen who sprang into the vehicle and overpowered W. F. Smith and Frank Wardell, messengers of the East River National bank at 680 Broadway.

Both messengers were badly injured and the robbers escaped with the money—$15,000 in five dollar bills and $10,000 in one hundred dollar bills. The currency was being transported from the Produce Exchange bank in the lower part of the city.

The robbers sprang into a big black automobile, which seemed to be awaiting their coming, and were quickly lost in the maze of traffic.

THREE KILLED IN WRECK

Pennsylvania Flyer Plunges Over Embankment While Running at Terrific Speed.

Huntington, Pa.—While running at a terrific speed the Pennsylvania limited, east-bound, plunged over a thirty-foot embankment at Warrior's Ridge, four miles west of here, killing two passengers and a negro matron and injuring fifty-three other persons.

The wreck was caused by a broken flange on a driving wheel of the second of the two locomotives that were pulling the train. The two passengers who were killed were in the dining car when the crash came.

The cars in the wreck were all of solid steel construction, and in these the passengers were imprisoned like rats in a trap.

STUDIED AFFRONT TO KAISER

Reichstag Chooses Socialist Representing the Emperor's District to Act as Its President.

Berlin.—The reichstag elected as its president Johannes Kaempf, the radical deputy who carried the emperor's district of central Berlin by a narrow majority at the recent general election.

Heinrich Dove, who is also a radical, was elected second deputy president in place of the national liberal, Dr. Herman Paasche, resigned.

The conservatives and centrists all cast blank balloting papers.

The present organization is only temporary and permanent officials must be chosen after a month has elapsed.

Enlistment Now Five Years.

Washington.—The amendment to the Hay military bill introduced by Chairman Hay providing that the period of enlistment in the United States army be extended from three to five years, was passed by a vote of 110 to 73 in the house.

Mrs. Pryor Dead.

New York.—Mrs. Sara A. Pryor, wife of ex-Justice Roger A. Pryor, formerly of Virginia, died at the Pryor home in this city. Mrs. Pryor's maiden name was Sara A. Rice.

FLAX GROWING IS PROFITABLE

WESTERN CANADA FARMERS BECOMING RICH IN ITS PRODUCTION.

So much has been written regarding the great amount of money made out of growing wheat in the prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, Western Canada, that many other products of the farms are overlooked. These provinces will always grow large areas of wheat—both spring and winter—and the yields will continue to be large, and the general average greater than in any other portion of the continent. Twenty, thirty, forty, and as high as fifty bushels per acre of wheat to the acre—yields unusual in other parts of the wheat growing portions of the continent—have attracted world-wide attention, but what of oats, which yield forty, fifty and as high as one hundred and ten bushels per acre and carry off the world's prize, which, by the way, was also done by wheat raised in Saskatchewan during last November at the New York Land Show. And then, there is the barley, with its big yields, and its excellent samples. Another money-maker, and a big one is flax. The growing of flax is extensively carried on in Western Canada. The writer has before him a circular issued by a prominent farmer at Saskatoon. The circular deals with the treatment of seed flax, the seeding and harvesting, and attributes yields of less than 20 bushels per acre, to later seeding, imperfect and ill-prepared seed. He sowed twenty-five pounds of seed per acre and had a yield of twenty-nine bushels per acre. This will probably dispose of at $2.50 per acre. Speaking of proper preparation of seed and cultivation of soil and opportune sowing, in the circular spoken of there is cited the case of a Mr. White, living fourteen miles south of Rosetown, "who had fifteen acres of summer fallow a year ago last summer, upon which he produced thirty-three bushels to the acre, when many in the district harvested for want of crop. Now, there can be no proper reason advanced why such a crop should not have been produced on all the lands of the same quality in the adjacent district, provided they had been worked and cared for in the same manner. This year (1911) the same man had one hundred acres of summer fallow, had something over 3,800 bushels of wheat. He also had 1,800 bushels of oats and 300 bushels of flax."

There are the cattle, the horses, the roots and the vegetable products of Western Canada farms, all of which individually and collectively deserve special mention, and they are treated of in the literature sent out on application by the Government agents.

But Mamma Didn't.

Little Mabel was always tumbling down and getting hurt, but as soon as her mother kissed the bumped forehead Mabel would believe it cured and cease crying. One day she accompanied her mother to the Union depot, and while they were seated in the crowded waiting room an intoxicated man entered the door, tripped over a suitcase, and fell sprawling on the floor. The attention of every one was attracted to the incident, and in the sudden silence following the fall Mabel called out:

"Don't cry, men. Mamma 'll kiss oo, and 'en oo 'll be all right."—Lippincott's Magazine.

Merchant, in His Long Life, Must Have Had Some Dealings With the "Limbs of the Law."

The aged merchant was undoubtedly very ill. In his own mind, at all events, he felt his days were numbered, and sent for the family lawyer

The light of the law now sat at his bedside, notebook in hand, eager to catch each word as it was uttered.

"I wish—" began the sick man.

"Yes?" answered the lawyer, hastily filling in the gap.

"All my property and estate to go to my eldest daughter."

The legal gentleman duly made a note of the fact.

"I wish to die firm in the knowledge that the property is assured to her," continued the merchant, with eager excitement.

"Of course—of course!" fussed the solicitor.

"Would it be too much," hesitatingly asked the sick man, "to suggest that you should marry her?"—Answers.

LAWYER CURED OF ECZEMA

"While attending school at Lebanon, Ohio, in 1882, I became afflicted with boils, which lasted for about two years, when the affliction assumed the form of an eczema on my face, the lower part of my face being inflamed most of the time. There would be water-blisters rise up and open, and wherever the water would touch it would burn, and cause another one to rise. After the blister would open, the place would scab over, and would burn and itch so as to be almost unbearable at times. In this way the sores would spread from one place to another, back and forth over the whole of my upper lip and chin, and at times the whole lower part of my face would be a solid sore. This condition continued for four or five years, without getting any better, and in fact got worse all the time, so much so that my wife became alarmed lest it prove fatal.

"During all this time of boils and eczema, I doctored with the best physicians of this part of the country, but to no avail. Finally I decided to try Cuticura Remedies, which I did, taking the Cuticura Resolvent, applying the Cuticura Ointment to the sores, and using the Cuticura Soap for washing. In a very short time I began to notice improvement, and continued to use the Cuticura Remedies until I was well again, and have not had a recurrence of the trouble since, which is over twenty years. I have recommended Cuticura Remedies to others ever since, and have great faith in them as remedies for skin diseases." (Signed) A. C. Brandon, Attorney-at-Law, Greenville, O., Jan. 17, 1911.

Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston.

BURNING DAYLIGHT

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his 30th birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling, in which over $100,000 is staked. Harnish loses his money and his mine but wins the mail contract. He starts on his mail trip with dogs and sledge, telling his friends that he will be in the big Yukon gold strike at the start.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

"Of course he'll make it," Kearns whispered in Bettles' ear. "And there's five hundred Daylight's back in sixty days," he added aloud.

Billy Rawlins closed with the wager, and Bettles hugged Kearns ecstatically.

"By Yupiter, I ban take that bet," Olaf Henderson said, dragging Daylight away from Bettles and Kearns.

"Winner pays!" Daylight shouted, closing the wager. "And I'm sure going to win, and sixty days is a long time between drinks, so I pay now. Name your brand, you hoochinoos! Name your brand!"

Somebody opened the outer door. A vague gray light filtered in.

"Burning Daylight, Burning Daylight," some one called warningly.

Daylight paused for nothing, heading for the door and pulling down his ear-flaps. Kama stood outside by the sled, a long, narrow affair, sixteen inches wide and seven and a half feet in length, its slatted bottom raised six inches above the steel-shod runners. On it, lashed with thongs of moose hide, were the light canvas bags that contained the mail, and the food and gear for dogs and men. In front of it, in a single line, lay curled five frost-rimmed dogs. They were huskies, matched in size and color, all unusually large and all gray. From their cruel jaws to their bushy tails they were as like as peas in their likeness to timber wolves. Wolves they were, domesticated, it was true, but wolves in appearance and in all their characteristics. On top the sled load, thrust under the lashings and ready for immediate use, were two pairs of snowshoes. Daylight was saying good-by to those who clustered around him. The Virgin wanted to kiss him, and, fuddled slightly though he was with the whisky, he saw his way out without compromising with the apron-string. He kissed the Virgin, but he kissed the other three women with equal partiality. He pulled on his long mittens, roused the dogs to their feet, and took his place at the gee-pole.

"Mush, you beauties!" he cried.

The animals threw their weights against their breastbands on the instant, crouching low to the snow and digging in their claws. They whined eagerly, and before the sled had gone half a dozen lengths both Daylight and Kama (in the rear) were running to keep up. And so, running, man and dogs dipped over the bank and down to the frozen bed of the Yukon, and in the gray light were gone. On the river, where was a packed trail and where snowshoes were unnecessary, the dogs averaged six miles an hour. To keep up with them, the two men were compelled to run. Daylight and Kama relieved each other regularly at the gee-pole, for here was the hard work of steering the flying sled and of keeping in advance of it. The man relieved dropped behind the sled, occasionally leaping upon it and resting. As if through a wall, Daylight had passed from the hum and roar of the Tivoli into another world—a world of silence and immobility. Nothing stirred. The Yukon slept under a coat of ice three feet thick.

The cold snap continued. Only men of iron kept the trail at such low temperatures, and Kama and Daylight were picked men of their races. But Kama knew the other was the better man, and thus, at the start, he was himself foredoomed to defeat. Not that he slackened his effort or willingness by the slightest degree, but that he was beaten by the burden he carried in his mind. His attitude toward Daylight was worshipful. Stoical, taciturn, proud of his physical prowess, he found all these qualities incarnated in his white companion.

CHAPTER III.

At Sixty Mile they restocked provisions, added a few pounds of letters to their load, and held steadily on. From Forty Mile they had unbroken trail, and they could look forward only to unbroken trail clear to Dyea. Daylight stood it magnificently, but the killing pace was beginning to tell on Kama. His pride kept his mouth shut, but the result of the chilling of his lungs in the cold snap could not be concealed. They traveled till ten o'clock the night they reached Selkirk, and at six next morning they plunged ahead into the next stretch of wilderness of nearly five hundred miles that lay between Selkirk and Dyea. There was no let-up in his pace. Twelve hours a day, six in the twilight and six in the dusk, they toiled on the trail. Three hours were consumed in cooking, repairing harnesses, and making and breaking camp, and the remaining nine hours dogs and men slept as if dead.

The time came when Kama was unable to go in the lead and break trail, and it was proof that he was far gone when he permitted Daylight to toil all day at the heavy snowshoe work. Lake by lake they crossed the string of lakes from Marsh to Linderman, and began the ascent of Chilcoot. By all rights Daylight should have camped below the last pitch of the pass at the dim end of day; but he kept on and over and down to Sheep Camp, while behind him raged a snow storm that would have delayed him twenty-four hours. This last excessive strain broke Kama completely. In the morning he could not travel. At five, when called, he sat up after a struggle, groaned, and sank back again. Daylight did the camp work of both, harnessed the dogs, and, when ready for the start, rolled the helpless Indian in all three sleeping robes and lashed him on top of the sled. The going was good; they were on their last lap; and he raced the dogs down through Dyea canyon and along the hard-packed trail that led to Dyea post. And running still, Kama groaning on top the load, and Daylight leaping at the gee-pole to avoid going under the runners of the flying sled, they arrived at Dyea by the sea. True to his promise, Daylight did not stop. An hour's time saw the sled loaded with the ingoing mail and grub, fresh dogs harnessed and a fresh Indian engaged. Kama never spoke from the time of his arrival till the moment Daylight, ready to depart, stood beside him to say good-by. They shook hands.

The Time Came When Kama Was Unable to Go in the Lead.

"You kill um dat damn Indian," Kama said. "Savvee, Daylight? You kill um."

"He'll sure last as far as Pelly," Daylight grinned.

Kama shook his head doubtfully, and rolled over on his side, turning his back in token of farewell.

• • •

A crowd filled the Tivoli—the old crowd that had seen Daylight depart two months before; for this was the night of the sixtieth day, and opinion was divided as ever as to whether or not he would compass the achievement. At ten o'clock bets were still being made, though the odds rose, bet by bet, against his success. Down in her heart the Virgin believed he had failed, yet she made a bet of twenty ounces with Charley Bates, against forty ounces, that Daylight would arrive before midnight.

She it was who heard the first yelps of the dogs.

"Listen!" she cried. "It's Daylight!"

There was a general stampede for the door; but when the Arctic storm-doors were thrown wide open, the crowd fell back. They heard the eager whining of dogs, the snap of a dog-whip and the voice of Daylight crying encouragement as the weary animals capped all they had done by dragging the sled in over the wooden floor. They came in with a rush, and with them rushed in the frost, a visible vapor of smoking white, through which their heads and backs showed, as they strained in the harness, till they had all the seeming of swimming in a river. Behind them, at the gee-pole, came Daylight, hidden to the knees by the swirling frost through which he appeared to wade. He was the same old Daylight, withal lean and tired-looking, and his black eyes were sparkling and flashing brighter than ever. His parka of cotton drill hooded him like a monk, and fell in straight lines to his knees. Grimed and scorched by camp-smoke and fire, the garment in itself told the story of his trip. A two-months' beard covered his face; and the beard, in turn, was matted with the ice of his breathing through the long seventy-mile run.

He experienced a thrill of surprise as the roar of welcome went up and as every familiar detail of the Tivoli greeted his vision—the long bar and the array of bottles, the gambling games, the big stove, the weigher at the gold-scales, the musicians, the men and women, the Virgin, Celia, and Nellie, Dan MacDonald, Bettles, Billy Rawlins, Olaf Henderson, Doc Watson—all of them. It was just as he had left it, and in all seeming it might well be the very day he had left. The sixty days of incessant travel through the white wilderness suddenly telescoped, and had no existence in time. They were a moment, an incident. He had plunged out and into them through the wall of silence, and back through the wall of silence he had plunged, apparently the next instant, and into the roar and turmoil of the Tivoli.

He drew a deep breath and cried: "The winner pays, and I'm the winner, ain't I? Surge up, you-all Malemutes and Siwashes, and name your poison! There's your Dyea mail, straight from Salt Water, and no hornswogglin about it! Cast the lashings adrift, you-all, and wade into it!"

A dozen pairs of hands were at the sled-lashings, when the young Le Barge Indian, bending at the same task, suddenly and limply straightened up. In his eyes was a great surprise. He stared about him wildly, for the thing he was undergoing was new to him. He was profoundly struck by an unguessed limitation. He shook as with a palsy, and he gave at the knees, slowly sinking down to fall suddenly across the sled and to know the smashing blow of darkness across his consciousness.

"Exhaustion," said Daylight. "Take him off and put him to bed, some of you-all. He's sure a good Indian."

A few minutes later, Daylight was whirling around the dance-floor, waltzing with the Virgin. And small wonder it was that the Virgin yielded herself to his arms, as they danced dance after dance, and sick at heart at the knowledge that he found nothing in her more than a good friend and an excellent dancer. Small consolation it was to know that he never loved any woman. She was sick with love of him, and he danced with her as he would dance with any woman, as he would dance with a man who was a good dancer and upon whose arm was tied a handkerchief to conventionalize him into a woman.

At one in the morning he saw Elijah Davis herding Henry Finn and Joe Hines, the lumber-jack, toward the door. Daylight interfered.

"Where are you-all going?" he demanded, attempting to draw them to the bar.

"Bed," Elijah Davis answered.

"Got to," Joe Hines added apologetically. "We're mushing out in the mornin'."

Daylight still detained them.

"Where to? What's the excitement?"

"No excitement," Elijah explained. "We're just a-goin' to play your hunch, an' tackle the Upper Country. Don't you want to come along?"

"I sure do," Daylight affirmed.

But the question had been put in fun, and Elijah ignored the acceptance.

"We're tacklin' the Stewart," he went on. "Al Mayo told me he seen some likely lookin' bars first time he come down the Stewart, and we're goin' to sample 'em while the river's froze. You listen, Daylight, an' mark my words, the time's comin' when winter diggin's 'll be all the go. There'll be men in them days that'll laugh at our summer scratchin' an' ground-wallerin'."

Elijah laughed, gathered his two partners up, and was making a second attempt to reach the door.

"Hold on," Daylight called. "I sure mean it."

The three men turned back suddenly upon him, in their faces surprise, delight, and incredulity.

"G'wan, you're foolin'," said Finn, the other lumber-jack, a quiet, steady, Wisconsin man.

"There's my dawgs and sled," Daylight answered. "That'll make two teams and halve the loads; though we-all 'll have to travel easy for a spell, for them dawgs is sure tired."

The three men were overjoyed, but still a trifle incredulous.

"Now look here," Joe Hines blurted out, "none of your foolin', Daylight. We mean business. Will you come?"

Daylight extended his hand and shook.

CHAPTER IV.

This time the trail was easier. It was better packed, and they were not carrying mail against time. At Forty Mile they laid over two days for the sake of the dogs, and at Sixty Mile Daylight's team was left with the trader. Unlike Daylight, after the terrible run from Selkirk to Circle City, they had been unable to recuperate on the back trail. So the four men pulled on from Sixty Mile with a fresh team of dogs on Daylight's sled. The following night they camped in the cluster of islands at the mouth of the Stewart. Daylight talked town sites, and, though the others laughed at him, he staked the whole maze of high, wooded island.

"Just supposing the big strike does come on the Stewart," he argued. "Mebbe you-all 'll be in on it, and then again mebbe you-all won't. But I sure will. You-all 'd better reconsider and go in with me on it."

But they were stubborn.

"You're as bad as Harper and Joe Ladue," said Joe Hines. "They're always at that game. You know that big flat jest below the Klondike and under Moosehide Mountain? Well, the recorder at Forty Mile was tellin' me they staked that not a month ago—The Harper & Ladue Town Site. Ha! Ha! Ha!"

Elijah and Finn joined in his laughter; but Daylight was gravely in earnest.

"There she is!" he cried. "The hunch is working! It's in the air, I tell you-all! What'd they-all stake the big flat for if they-all didn't get the hunch? Wish I'd staked it."

The regret in his voice was provocative of a second burst of laughter.

"Laugh, dang you, laugh! Why your eyes ain't open yet. You-all are a bunch of little mewing kittens. I tell you-all if that strike comes on Klondike, Harper and Ladue will be millionaires. And if it comes on Stewart, you-all watch the Elam Harnish town site boom. In them days, when you-all come around makin' poor mouths . . ." He heaved a sigh of resignation. "Well, I suppose I'll have to give you-all a grub-stake or soup, or something or other."

Wonderful Baby.

"You say your baby doesn't walk yet?" said Jones. "Mine does, and it's not so old as yours. Your baby cut his teeth yet?"

"Not yet," said Bones.

"Oh mine has—all of them," said Jones. "Your baby talk?"

"Not yet," replied Bones; "can yours?"

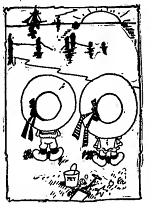
"Great Scott, yes," answered Jones. Then Bones got desperate. "Does he use a safety razor or one of the others?" he asked.—Ideas.

FOR EVERY FAMILY MEDICINE CHEST

To the head of every family the health of its different members is most important, and the value of an agreeable laxative that is certain in its effect is appreciated. One of the most popular remedies in the family medicine chest is a combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin that is known to druggists and physicians as Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This preparation is mild and gentle in its action on the bowels, yet positive in its effect. A dose of Syrup Pepsin at night means relief next morning, while its tonic properties tone up and strengthen the muscles of stomach, liver and bowels so that these organs are able in a short time to again perform their natural functions without help.

Druggists everywhere sell Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried this simple, inexpensive, yet effective remedy, write to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill., and ask for a sample bottle. Dr. Caldwell will be glad to send it without any expense to you whatever.

COMPARISON.



He—Ah! Genevieve, when I looks at the immense expense of boundless ocean, it actually makes me feel small!

Mean People.

Henry Russell, the head of the Boston opera, was describing his foreign tour in search of talent.

"They were mean people," he said of the singers of a certain city. "I could do no business with them. They thought only of money."

Mr. Russell smiled.

"They were as bad as the man who discovered the Blank theater fire.

"The first intimation the box office had of this fire came, at the end of the third act, from a fat man who bounded down the gallery stairs, stuck his face in at the ticket window and shouted breathlessly:

"'Theater's afire! Gimme me money back!'"

Always Leap Year.

"It's leap year every year in Papua," said an ethnologist. "The reason isn't that the woman are the bosses there. No, quite the contrary. The reason is that love-making is supposed to be a thing beneath the notice of the Papuan male.

"All women look alike to him. So the matrimonial pourparlers all fall on the female sex.

"If a man accepts a girl's proposal, the fact that he is engaged is chalked on his back. But on the girl's back the engagement is branded with a red-hot iron."

Feline.

Lou—I would rather a man would call me a fool than a knave.

Sue—Of course. It's truth that hurts.—Toledo Blade.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879.

One week more in which to pay your personal property tax.

Halvor Steenersons Indian name is Omy-ya We Ga-Bo. And just to make good on it, Halvor got up in congress a few days ago and gave a couple of war whoops.—Bemidji Sentinal.

Albert Kiser, of Bagley is said to be a candidate for Lieutenant governor. That's business; we like to see the northern part of the sate going after their share of the plumbs.

President Taft has one year and ten days more to stay in the employ of this government, It don't make any difference whether he is nominated or not, he will step down and out on March 4th,1913, just the same.

There should not be any bitter fight made by the progressive Republicans, who favor the nomination of LaFoilette, agains Roosevelt, for he may be the only man that can defeat Taft, when the show down comes.

The Thief River Falls Times is hunting up the records of the entire state to find a parallel case of the shutting off of Red Lake River by the lumber companys, but up to date has faild to land one, and we don't think they will, as we consider it the dirtist deal that we ever heard of.

The "roarback", that the twin city dailes tried to spring on Congressman Steenerson, about that White Earth Indian deal, got a dash of cold water, when it reached the country editors of the 9th, District. Congressman Steener son should not spend time to answer such "rot", as the boys up in this neck of the woods will attend to those little matters.

C. A. Hitchcock, of Crookston has notified the people that this is campaign year, by filing and announceing himself as a candidate for the Republican nomination for sheriff of Polk county. Mr. Hitchcock by his long residence in Polk county, and his pleasing ways, has gaind for himself a host of friends and the candidate who defeats him will know that he has been in a race.

At the last reports that we got from Washington there had not been any report made by the St. Paul engineers office to the war department, about the Red Lake River meetings held in January. Ain't that a fine outfit to be in the employ of this government? Of course our representatives at Washington can not do anything until they get this report, which will probabley be sent down in June, with a statement from Mrjor Shunk to the affect, that the people had made a mistake, as the river was high instead of low.

Comman Mistake.

"De man dat allers wants de biggest en' do most of everything," said Uncle Eben, "is liable to pick up an ostrich an' overlook da turkey bird."—Washington Star.

A Genius Who Works.

Robert W. Chambers, the novelist, was called a genius the other day at the Century club in New York.

But Mr. Chambers, with his wonted charming modesty, denied that he was a genius.

"Unless, indeed," he added, "we accept the definition that genius is 1 per cent inspiration and 99 per cent perspiration."—New York Tribune.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON PETITION FOR ORMATION OF NEW SCHOOL DISTRICT.

WHEREAS, A petition has been filed with the County board of the County of Pennington, State of Minnesota, signed and acknowledged by a majority of the freeholders who reside in the proposed new district herein described, and who are entitled to vote at school meetings in their respective districts, and doly verified by the affidavit of one of the residents of said proposed new district, praying for the organization of a new school district out of of the territory hereinafter described, to wit:

The whole of Sections Fifteen (15) Fourteen (14) Thirteen (13) Twenty-Fonr (24) Twenty-three (23) Twenty-two (22), and that part of Sections Ten (10) Eleven (11) Twelve (12) lying south of Red Lake River, all in the Township One Hundred Fifty Two [152] N. Range Thirty-nine [39], and the said Board of County Commissioners have appointed a time and place of hearing upon said petition as by law required:

Now Therefore, NOTICE Is hereby given that a hearing upon said petition will be had at a meeting of said board, commenceing upon the 29th, day of March A.D. 1912, at 1 o' clock in the afternoon of said day, at the office of County Auditor in the City of Thief River Falls in said County, at which time and place the said County Board will hear arguments of all persons interested, for or against the proposed organization of said new school district.

Dated Thief River Falls Minn. this 19th, day of February A. D. 1912.

ROMANCE OF A SHOVEL.

An Idea That Won a Fortune For a Railway Laborer.

The simplest labor saving device may quite possibly be worth a fortune. One day a good many years ago a number of men were at work on the roadbed of a line of railway in course of construction between Birmingham and Manchester. They were cutting through a hill and moving the materiel by loosening it with picks, shovelling it into barrows and wheeling it away. The shovels they were using were known as Irish shovels, with a square cornered blade about fifteen inches long. The work progressed but slowly, and the subcontractor in charge rebuked his workmen for not making quicker progress. One of them replied that if he would grind off the corners of the shovels it would be easier to get them into the earth, and, consequently, they would be able to work more quickly.

The contractor ridiculed the idea, which he considered a piece of insolence on the part of the workman, but the navvy was quite in earnest and not easily discouraged. When the work was completed he discussed the matter with a friend of his at Sheffield, who persuaded an ironmonger he knew to make a dozen or so as an experiment. The tools were offered to a large contractor, who promised to let some of his men use the new shovels and report results.

About a week afterward the contractor returned with the information that his men were fairly quarreling as to who should use the new tools, some arriving to work a quarter of an hour before time in order to be there first when the tool box was opened. The navvy's suggestion had proved a good one. A patent was secured and an agreement made between the navvy, the manufacturer and the contractor. When the navvy died he left a fortune of over £65,000, the proceeds from royalties on the manufacture of shovels under his patent.—Pearson's Weekly.

DEATHBED SCENES.

And the Question of Prolonging Life to Its Utmost Limit.

Even the lengthening of a man's life by a day may make death easier by giving him the opportunity of soothing a guilty conscience, of signing a will, of redressing an injustice, of healing a breach of friendship the memory of which might imbitter another life, of saying farewell to a son or daughter who had come in haste from a great distance. Any one who has seen deathbeds knows how anxieties of this sort may darken the last hours and how their removal may reconcile the sufferer to death. It seems to us that this talk of the right to die and the wrongdoing of doctors in seeking to prolong a life that is hanging by a thread springs from the unwholesome sentimentalism and the inevitable accompaniment of selfishness which are among the unhappy notes of the present time.

To the older writers the death agony was the final struggle of the soul leaving the body, and by a confusion of thought due to the acquired meaning of the word it has come to be generally believed that the parting of the spiritual from the material part of man is painful. Those whose lot it has been to stand at many deathbeds know that this is not the case. Sir William Osler says that he has careful records of about 500 deathbeds, studied particularly with reference to the modes of dying and the sensations of the dying. Of these ninety suffered bodily pain or distress of one sort or another, eleven showed mental apprehension, two positive terror, one expressed spiritual exaltation, one bitter remorse. The great majority gave no sign one way or the other.—[illegible]

Chinese Criminal Law.

Curiously like the Mosaic and Roman customs, the fixed laws of China are carved in stone and set up in the streets. Chinese criminal law, which is founded on the "Chan Kung," or ritual of Chau, is based upon the accused confessing, and no punishment can ensue until this is brought about. Before the condemned are decapitated they are offered all the samschu they desire to drink, and in most cases they are allowed to choose whether they will ride in a ricksha or be carried in a sedan.—J. S. Thomson's "The Chinese."

Severing Old Ties.

Willie was sent out by his mother to the woodshed to saw and split some stove wood out of a pile of old railroad ties. Going outdoors shortly after, she found the youth sitting on the sawhorse with his head bowed down in his hands. She asked her hopeful why he didn't keep at his work.

"My dear mother," he replied with much feeling, "I find it so hard, so very hard, to sever old ties."—Lippincott's.

OLD SHIP CLOCKS.

Crude Devices Mariners Used In Reckoning Time.

SANDGLASS MOST POPULAR.

If It Were Carefully Attended to the Skipper Could Tell the Days Fairly Well, but It Was Often Juggled—The First Chronometers.

To ascertain the time when at sea is now a matter of the utmost simplicity. But such was not the case in the old sailing days, and in order to acquire even the vaguest idea of longitude and time the seaman had recourse to curious devices.

Crude as these devices appear compared with present day instruments, they save the mariner from chaos and destruction, and even if he could not name the hour with any degree of certainty he at least knew the day of the week.

Eclipses of the moon and the positions of the stars afforded a little guide to the skipper, who was, nevertheless, greatly handicapped by his lack of astronomical knowledge and the inferior quality of his spyglass. Moreover, eclipses could not be arranged for every night in the week, and there were dark nights when the stars could not be seen, so various devices had to be pressed into service.

The most popular form of old sea clock was the sandglass. Many of these glasses were timed to run twenty-four hours, and prior to the ship leaving land the glass was set exactly at noon. If it were carefully watched and turned as soon as the sand ran down the skipper could reckon the days with fair accuracy.

Side by side with the large glass were placed half hour and minute glasses. The man at the helm carefully watched this old sea clock and announced the time at regular intervals by striking a bell. It was customary to estimate the duration of any incident by so many glasses. "To flog the glass" was an operation very congenial to lazy seamen. It consisted in turning the glass before all the sand had run down so that the watch was appreciably shortened.

When the twenty-four hour glass was employed a little juggling was indulged in for the purpose of finding the longitude. The difference between the twenty-four hour glass and the time by the sun was estimated and this difference was held to represent the longitude east or west, according as the sun's time might be before or after the time returned by the glass.

"Taking the sun" was a weird and wonderful operation. Clumsy quadrants were utilized, and toward midday the captain appeared on deck to perform his solemn duty. After much screwing of eyes and waggling of the quadrant the captain would bawl out to the mate, "Make it — bells!" the number varying according to personal idiosyncrasies.

A demand for a more satisfactory device for estimating time at sea was responsible for experiments being made with pendulum clocks, though with little success. The interest of inventors was aroused when the English government in 1714 offered £10,000 to any one inventing a method of reckoning longitude to within a degree, or sixty miles; £15,000 if within forty miles and £20,000 if within thirty miles.

John Harrison, an obscure Yorkshire carpenter, who had achieved a local reputation by repairing and cleaning clocks, came forward with a chronometer which at once attracted attention. Through the influence of Dr Halley he was enabled to make a voyage in a government vessel to Lisbon, where he succeeded in determining the longitude to within 1 degree 30 minutes.

For this achievement he was granted £500 to enable him to proceed with his invention. After thirty years' hard toil he produced a chronometer on which the present marine chronometer is based. His invention was shaped like a large watch, and in 1761 Harrison's son embarked for Jamaica in order to carry out tests. On the voyage out the chronometer was only 5.1 seconds in error, and during the whole trip from Portsmouth to Jamaica and back the variation was only 1 minute 54.5 seconds.

The accuracy of the chronometer thus enabled the longitude to be determined within eighteen miles, a result which exceeded the admiralty's most sanguine expectations. After further demonstrations an act of parliament was passed in 1765 awarding Harrison £20,000, half of the money to be paid as soon as he explained how his timekeeper was constructed and the remainder when the government was convinced that these timekeepers could be made by others. Despite the fulfillment of these conditions, Harrison had to wait several years before the money was paid over.

Larcum Kendal, who had been Harrison's apprentice and who was ultimately his successor, followed on the lines laid down by his master and produced a chronometer which was used by Captain Cook during his daring voyage in the Resolution. Of this chronometer Cook wrote, "Our longitude can never be erroneous while we have so good a guide as Mr. Kendal's watch."

Various horologists have introduced so many improvements that little trace of Harrison's model is to be discerned in the modern chronometer, though to him must be assigned the credit of pointing out the way.

The heart has reasons that reason does not understand.—Bossuet.

BLOOD MONEY IN PERSIA.

Curious Laws In That Country Governing the Crime of Murder.

A Persian murderer may pay blood money in lieu of his own life. The manner in which this is calculated is one of the most complicated things about Persian law. A woman is worth only half a man, and so a man cannot be executed for the murder of a mere woman. A husband whose wife had been killed by his steward was obliged first to pay half the steward's blood price to the man's relations, and thus the steward, having been reduced to the value of half a man, equal to one whole woman, was legally executed.

From this principle it follows that a man who has killed two women can be condemned to death, as equality is not infringed. If the murder of a woman be committed by several men the friends, upon whose initiative alone any proceedings can take place, can demand the death of but one of the murderers and always by paying the difference in the price of blood. On the same ground if two women murder a man the death of both can be demanded.

Evidently one could make a considerable fortune in Persia by getting one's men folk murdered by a woman apiece. Much the same plan is carried out in the case of minor injuries, with this curious addition—that the part of the body paid for is considered to be the property of the one who pays the blood money.—London Times.

What He Gives.

"He never gives his wife anything."

"Doesn't?"

"I should say not."

"You are wrong."

"What does he give her?"

"Assorted snubs."

Wagner's Nerve.

Wagner, the eminent composer, had the nerves of an acrobat. Once he was climbing a precipitous mountain in company with a young friend. When some distance up and walking along a narrow ledge the companion, who was following, called out that he was growing giddy. Wagner turned around on the ledge of rock, caught his friend and passed him between the rock and himself to the front.

Brain Work.

"Does your husband help you much around the house?" asked the neighbor.

"Well," replied the tired looking woman, "Josiah's work is mostly brain work. He keeps right busy thinkin' up ways for me to economize."—Washington Star.

Marlin

THE Marlin Model 1894 is a medium light weight repeating rifle, a well proportioned, finely balanced gun with all the advantages and comforts of the Marlin solid-top, side-ejecting construction. It is quick and easy of operation, accurate up to 300 yards and a very pleasant gun to carry and to shoot.

For settled districts and farming country where the shooting at woodchucks, badgers, foxes, 'coons, hawks, etc., is at ranges from 100 to 200 yards, the .25-20 and .32-20 rifles with the black and low-pressure smokeless loads cannot be equalled for accuracy and safety. The factory ammunition for the Model '94 rifles is cheap, and can be reloaded at very small cost.

The up-to-date sportsman needs the "Marlin Book" every day in the year. It contains [illegible] pages of live stuff for the man who loves a good [illegible] wants to know everything about it. FREE for [illegible] postage.

Our Wasted Seaweed Resources

In these days when so much is said about the conservation of our natural resources and the utilization of products that are neglected and wasted, it is strange that no account is taken of the marine forests and gardens that fringe our sea coast. Yet, since seaweeds are the only vegetation found over three-fourths of the superficial area of the earth, it must be obvious that their place in the economy of nature must be far from being insignificant. In their native element the most important function of these seaweeds is the same as that performed by ordinary forms of vegetation on land—that of rendering animal life possible. They take the elements existing in water as impurities and transform them into materials essential to animal life. It is evident, therefore, that the seaweeds are not quite as useless as they are supposed to be.

Along the coast of New England, the British Isles and western Europe they are used as fertilizers. In many countries they are fed to swine and cattle. In Holland they have been employed in the building of dykes. Sometimes they are used to stuff mattresses, cushions and upholstered furniture. Experiments have been carried on to use them as a substitute for wood pulp in the manufacture of paper. But the Japanese have attained the climax of utility in the employment of the seaweeds. In the bay of Tokyo 2,500 acres are planted every year with the red laver, a sea plant, which is transformed into a dried and toasted powder which is of highly nutritious value, being rich in proteids. These weeds are planted in a very curious manner. In October and November bundles of bamboo or brush are prepared and taken to the grounds in boats at low tide. Deep holes are made in the muddy bed of the bay by thrusting down through the water an elongated conical wooden frame with two long upright wooden handles. Into each of these holes is placed one of these brush bundles, forming long rows that project above the water. The brushes afford a lodging place for the spores of the red laver and they become attached to the twigs and develop within three or four months into plants which are fit to be harvested. They are then cut, dried, pressed, toasted and ground into a powder. This red laver grows abundantly along the coasts of the United States.

SEAWEED ON SANDY BEACH AFTER A STORM. THE AIR VESSEL OF THE GIANT SEAWEED ARE CONSPICUOUS

THE IRISH MOSS INDUSTRY OF MASSACHUSETTS RAKING UP THE PRODUCT

PHYLLOSPORA NEWYESII

A COMMON FEATHER MOSS

Of greater importance than this is the manufacture of a seaweed isinglass which is exported from Japan to all the countries of the world. There are not less than 500 establishments in Japan which are making this isinglass. It is prepared from seaweeds of the genus Gelidium. They are boiled, strained and filtered in order to separate the gelatine from the other materials. The ready product is white, shiny and semi-transparent and is used in making jellies, soups, sauces and to purify the wine of the natives, which is made from rice and is called "sake." In the United States it is chiefly employed in food preparations where gelatine is required. It is also used for the sizing of textiles, the stiffening of the warp of silk, the clarifying of wines, beer and coffee, the making of molds in the manufacture of paper. In all civilized countries the Japanese gelatine, under the name of agar-agar, is used exclusively as the culture medium in bacteriological work. Large shipments of this gelatine are also sent to the schnapps factories in Holland.

The most abundant of all seaweeds are the kelps, distributed along every coast line. From these the Japanese prepare "kombu," which enters into the dietary of every family in Japan. It is used as a vegetable, cooked with soups, fish and meats, it is also made into confections and beverages.

Iodine has been manufactured from kelps for many years, but the price has been so reduced by the working of the nitrate fields of Peru that its manufacture from kelps in the United States can be made attractive and profitable only by utilization of the by-products such as chloride of potash, algin, cellulose, dextrin, mannite and other salts, including sodium alginate.

The United States, however, has one seaweed industry of commercial importance in Irish moss, a form of alga that grows abundantly along the Atlantic coast, particularly north of Cape Cod. The center of the industry is at Scituate, Mass., where it has been exploited for over three-quarters of a century. The average annual output at present is about 800,000 pounds, valued at $25,000. It is used chiefly for making blanc mange, and is also employed in making cough remedies, jellies and puddings. It is also used for clarifying beer and in sizing fabrics.

In Roman times an alkaline dye was prepared from seaweed, probably from fucus vesiculosus, the common bladderwrack. The "seaweed pictures" sold at watering places almost invariably contain a large proportion of the dried external skeletons of plant-like animals, such as the sea-mats (flustra) and sea-firs (sertularia).

Between twenty and fifty fathoms seweeds are rare, beyond that depth their occurrence is exceptional. The principal natural means of distribution are, of course, ocean currents; but man counts for something, inasmuch as species are brought from port to port on the bottom of ships. Among the chief barriers must be reckoned stretches of deep sea, coast deserts of sand and mud, and the irruption of fresh water lowering the salinity of the neighboring tidal water. Probably the oldest seaweed known is one of siphoneous structure, described as from the Devonian rocks.

Besides being used in the manufacture of iodine, the coarser brown seaweeds are also collected for manure, and the vraik or wrack harvest, or cutting of these weeds in the Channel islands, forms an important part of the farmer's work at certain times of the year. Laver, prepared from a species of porphyra, is valued as a delicate condiment in the west of England, and a similar preparation from ulva latissima is known as green laver. Dulse (rhodymenia palmata) and tangles (the young stalks of laminaria digitata and L. saccharine) have been used for food in times of scarcity, but must be difficult of digestion. The last named species yield mannite. Among the best known forms of green seaweeds are the tubular entermorphia, or pipe-weed; the branched cladophora; ulva, or sea lettuce, with flat spreading fronds; the feathery bryopsis, like a miniature palm tree; and the button-like codium, or sea purse.

The brown seaweeds are arranged in three groups—phaeosporeae, fucaceae and dictyotaceae—according to their mode of reproduction. In all there are about 170 genera, chiefly from the colder seas, and varying in size from the minute ectocarpus growing on species of fucus to the gigantic macrocystis and lessonia of the Antarctic. The floating thallus of the former may reach a length of a thousand feet, and the branching tree-stalk of the latter is several yards high, and as thick as a man's arm. Sargassum, or gulf-weed, is included here. These belong to the first group, in which a sexual reproduction is effected by swarm-spores; sexual reproduction also takes place by the conjugation of cells, usually differing from swarm-spores only by their fusion. Here also belong the tangles (laminaria), with fronds borne on a stalk that shows some advance in structure. In the fucaceae, of which the bladder-wrack (fucus), sea-oak (halidrys), and sea-thongs (himanthalia) are common examples, the female cells are non-motile, and the male cells free-swimming; a sexual reproduction does not occur. The common Dictyota dichotoma and the rarer peacock weed (padina pavonia) may well represent the third group. A sexual reproduction is effected by non-motile spores; the male and the female cells are also non-motile. A single cell is produced in, and ejected from, the female organ; the male cells do not bear cilia. According to Strasburger the process of fertilization has not been observed. The third group contains nearly 300 genera, mostly from temperate and tropical seas.

The vast harvest of the sea, as represented by the algae that grow to maturity and then decay along our extended coast lines and are wasted, is capable of adding tens of millions to the wealth of the nation, of supporting numerous industries that would give permanent employment to many thousands of people, and of relieving American manufacturers from dependence upon foreign sources of supply for chemicals and other materials used in various arts and industries.

His Magic Wand Not Waved

Money King Apparently Asked Leading Question Only as a Matter of Information.

John D. Rockefeller gets a lot of fun out of his money. Of late years he has chosen as his friends several young newspaper writers, and one day, playing a game of golf with a reporter, he let out this howl:

"I enjoy being with young men so much that I wish I could seek their society more freely, but it is a hard thing for me to do. You see, I meet people, and begin to like them, and just when I do that they hit me in the back with a contribution box."

The young man agreed with the millionaire that such a practice was discouraging, not to say disgusting, appalling and frightful. This cheered Rockefeller immensely.

"By the way," said the oil magnate graciously, "how are you getting on financially?"

The reporter immediately had a vision of tumbling into a pile of money, but he was too crafty to give any sign of his elation.

"Oh," he said airily. "I'm doing about as well as a man of my age could expect."

Then Mr. Rockefeller, without cracking a smile, resumed the game.—Popular Magazine.

Why Price of Coffee Soars

Growers Have Quit Raising the Bean and Have Turned to Cultivation of Rubber.

Motor cars are partly to blame for the higher price of coffee. One may not be able to own a motor car, but because of them one may soon be too poor to have a cup of Rio for breakfast.

Coffee growers have quit raising coffee and are cultivating rubber, the Los Angeles Examiner says. The motor car has boomed the rubber market until there is big money in producing the raw material, while the price of coffee for 15 years has been so low that there was little or no money in it.

That is the explanation the coffee brokers give of the sudden advance in the price of the bean without which an American breakfast is a tasteless thing.

There has been some talk of a shortage in the supply of raw rubber, but according to consular reports the seringa rubber district in the Amazon valley in South America would be sufficient by itself to supply the growing needs of the world's consumption if it could be worked economically, which is only possible with a far greater population than that at present available and better means of transport. At present, except in the Acre, seringa rubber has practically only been touched to a distance of about six miles on each side of rivers navigable by some sort of craft.

It must be awfully unlucky to wa'' under thirteen ladders.

Girls

Read About These Three Girls. How Sick They Were and How Their Health Was Restored by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Appleton, Wis.—"I take pleasure in writing you an account of my sickness. I told a friend of mine how I felt and she said I had female trouble and advised me to use Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as she had taken it herself for the same trouble with wonderful results. I had been sickly for two years and overworked myself, and had such bad feelings every month that I could hardly walk for pain. I was very nervous and easily tired out and could not sleep nights. I had dizzy spells, and pimples came on my face. But I have taken your Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it has restored my health. I think it is the best medicine in existence."—Miss Cecilia M. Bauer, 1161 Lawrence St., Appleton, Wis.

A SCHOOL TEACHER'S GRATITUDE:

Geneva, Iowa.—"I have been teaching school for some years and I have neglected my health because I was too busy with my work to attend to myself properly. I suffered greatly every month and was on the verge of a nervous breakdown.

"I wrote to you about my condition and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and the Blood Purifier as you recommended. These remedies have done wonders for me and I can highly and widely recommend them to every suffering woman."—Miss Minnie Shaver, R. F. D. No. 1, Geneva, Iowa, c/o Sam Erickson.

A COLORADO GIRL'S CASE:

Montrose, Col.—"I was troubled very much with irregular periods. Sometimes two months would elapse. I suffered severe headache, was weak and nervous, could eat scarcely anything.

"I took both Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier and the result was wonderful. I feel like another person.

"I think your remedies are the best on earth and cannot express my thankfulness to you for what they have done to me. I help my neighbors when they are sick, and I shall always recommend your medicines."—Miss Ella McCandless, Montrose, Col.

Is it not reasonable to suppose that a medicine that did so much for these girls will benefit any other girl who is suffering with the same troubles?

Does it not seem the only sensible thing to give such a medicine at least a trial? You may be sure that it can do you no harm, and there are lots of proof that it will do you much good.

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself who will not try this famous medicine, made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.

Write to LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO. (CONFIDENTIAL) LYNN, MASS., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

Splendid Crops

In Saskatchewan (Western Canada)

800 Bushels from 20 acres of wheat was the thresher's return from a Lloydminster farm in the season of 1910. Many fields in that as well as other districts yielded from 25 to 35 bushels of wheat to the acre. Other grains in proportion.

LARGE PROFITS are thus derived from the FREE HOMESTEAD LANDS of Western Canada.

This excellent showing causes prices to advance. Land values should double in two years' time.

Grain growing, mixed farming, cattle raising and dairying are all profitable. Free Homesteads of 160 acres are to be had in the very best districts; 160 acre pre-emptions at $3.00 per acre within certain areas. Schools and churches in every settlement, climate unexcelled, soil the richest; wood, water and building material plentiful.

For particulars as to location, low settlers' railway rates and descriptive illustrated pamphlet, "Last Best West," and other information, write to Sup't of Immigration, Ottawa, Canada, or to Canadian Government Agent.

RHEUMATISM A DISEASE OF THE BLOOD

The Treatment Which Is Most Successful Is Directed Toward Building Up and Purifying the Vital Fluid.

That rheumatism is a disease of the blood is shown by the fact that it is hereditary in certain families, and that there is a marked thinning of the blood immediately following its attack.

In the following brief statement are described symptoms which every patient will recognize and the means by which a cure was effected in this case is described with equal fidelity.

If you are suffering from any form of rheumatism with loss of flesh and strength, and thinning of the blood, the remedy that was so effective here deserves a thorough trial.

"About fifteen years ago," says Mrs. Rhoda Pettit, of Louisville, Neb., "after exposure to dampness and wet and being in a run-down condition from overwork, I began to suffer from inflammatory rheumatism. Both my father and mother were sufferers from the same disease. My right side was afflicted and had I no use of my right limb. The cords of the limb seemed to be drawn up. Often the pains would shift from one part of the body to another and, while they were worse in my right limb, they were very severe through the small of my back. There was a sensation as though I was being cut with a knife. My limbs and feet were swollen so that I could not put on my shoes. I suffered intense agony all of the time and when the attacks were severe I was confined to bed for weeks. My stomach was in bad shape. I was troubled with heartburn and gas. I lost weight and my strength was all gone.

"I took medicine from a doctor and tried several other remedies and liniments but nothing helped me until I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I had taken them only a short time before I could feel the new blood and after a fair trial I was able to walk. The pills made me a strong, healthy woman and I am entirely cured of the rheumatism. I know I would not be living today if I had not tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y. The genuine are sold only in packages bearing the full trade-mark.

Men and His Happiness.

"Man is the creator of his own happiness; it is the aroma of a life lived in harmony with high ideals. For what a man has, he may be dependent on others; what he is, rests with him alone. What he obtains in life is but acquisition; what he attains, is growth. Happiness is the soul's joy in the possession of the intangible."—From Self-Control, by William George Jordan.

Plans for Tuberculosis Day.

Sermons on the prevention of consumption will be preached in thousands of churches on April 28, which the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis has set aside as Tuberculosis day. Last year out of 200,000 churches in the United States, over 50,000 observed Tuberculosis day, and millions of churchgoers were told about this disease from the pulpit. This year will be the third observation of Tuberculosis day. Plans are being made to have the gospel of health preached more widely than ever before. The movement will be pushed through the 600 anti-tuberculosis associations allied with the national association and through the boards of health, woman's clubs and other organizations in hundreds of cities and towns throughout the country. Through these various bodies the churches will be reached and interested in the tuberculosis campaign.

THE DOCTOR HABIT

And How She Overcame It.

When well selected food has helped the honest physician place his patient in sturdy health and free from the "doctor habit," it is a source of satisfaction to all parties. A Chicago woman says:

"We have not had a doctor in the house during all the 5 years that we have been using Grape-Nuts food. Before we began, however, we had 'the doctor habit,' and scarcely a week went by without a call on our physician.

"When our youngest boy arrived, 5 years ago, I was very much run down and nervous, suffering from indigestion and almost continuous headaches. I was not able to attend to my ordinary domestic duties and was so nervous that I could scarcely control myself. Under advice I took to Grape-Nuts.

"I am now, and have been ever since we began to use Grape-Nuts food, able to do all my own work. The dyspepsia, headaches, nervousness and rheumatism which used to drive me fairly wild, have entirely disappeared.

"My husband finds that in the night work in which he is engaged, Grape-Nuts food supplies him the most wholesome, strengthening and satisfying lunch he ever took with him." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GOVERNMENT ARRESTS MANY LABOR LEADERS

OFFICIALS AND FORMER OFFICIALS OF IRON WORKERS' UNION ARE DETAINED ALL OVER COUNTRY.

RESULTS OF DYNAMITE INVESTIGATION

Prisoners Accused of Conspiring Against "Open Shop Contractors." —Frank M. Ryan and Herbert Hockin, Chief Officers, Held in Case.

Indianapolis, —The United States government caused the arrest of almost all of the 54 men indicted in the alleged dynamite conspiracy cases.

It took into custody within a few hours practically the entire staff of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Workers, including the chief officers, members of the executive board and about 20 business agents and former business agents.

These included Frank M. Ryan, the president; John T. Butler of Buffalo, N. Y., the first vice president, and Herbert S. Hockin, the second vice president and successor of J. J. McNamara as secretary-treasurer, and each of these men was required to give $10,000 bond for his appearance for arraignment here with all the other defendants on March 12.

By its action the government revealed the identities of the men whom it charges with being the accomplices of the McNamaras and Ortie McManigal in the dynamite plots, embracing almost 100 explosions, which were begun in Massachusetts in 1905, which were scattered over the country for six years, and which resulted in the wrecking of the Los Angeles Times building with a loss of 21 lives, and an attempt to blow up a bridge over which President Taft, in a special train, was to pass, near Santa Barbara, Cal., last October.

Fourteen of those indicted are each required to furnish $10,000 bond, and 40 are each required to furnish $5,000 bond, making an aggregate bond required of $340,000.

Immediately upon his arrest President Ryan addressed a statement to union labor men throughout the country calling upon them to believe in his innocence and in the innocence of his co-defendants.

The indictment on which all the men were arrested was made public last night. It charges all the 54 men with conspiracy to violate the statutes forbidding the carrying of explosives on passenger trains and details 47 transportations, charged as overt acts, and names Ortie E. McManigal, or Herbert S. Hockin, in each act, but does not specify the part taken by the other defendants.

All of the defendants are named in each of the 32 indictments and according to District Attorney Miller, sentences may be imposed for each of the offenses. It is the contention of the government that each of the defendants was guilty in each of the conspiracy charges, although his active participation may have been in one transportation only.

There are 14 indictments charging overt acts and 14 charging unconsummated acts of conspiracy. Another indictment of 34 counts charges all the defendants as being principals in the transportation of nitro-glycerin.

A further indictment of 34 counts charges McManigal and J. B. McNamara with physical transportation of nitro-glycerin and all the other co-defendants with abetting.

Two other remaining indictments, with 16 counts each, charge all the defendants with being principals in the transportation of dynamite and with having aided McManigal and J. B. McNamara.

Altogether, the indictments contain 128 counts against each of the defendants and the penalty for any one of the offenses varies from 18 months to two years in prison.

Sixty-five of the explosions considered in the indictments were on work of members of the National Erectors' association, an organization of "open shop" employers, and 31 explosions or attempts were on work of contractors who were not members of the erectors' association.

More than 200 witnesses from Boston to Los Angeles and from Duluth to points in Tennessee were examined. The investigation was directed to the matter of conspiracies to commit offenses against the laws of the United States and the transportation of dynamite and nitro-glycerin as defined and made punishable by the various acts of congress of 1886, 1908 and 1909.

Bequests to Catholic Institutions.

Kenosha, Wis., Feb. 15.—The pontifical college of the Roman Catholic church at Columbus, Ohio, will receive a bequest of $20,000 from the estate of Magdalena Bain, filed for probate here yesterday. In addition to this Mrs. Bain bequeathed $1,000 to the Roman Catholic orphanage at St Francis, Wis. Mrs. Bain had been a devout Catholic and several years ago she made a will providing that all of her property save $2,000, which was bequeathed to a favorite niece, should go to the church.

BOATMAN HAD HIS OWN IDEA

Absence of Expected "Tip" Brought Out Excellent Sample of Real Irish Wit.

A good story of Irish repartee has been published concerning John Bright. He was always ready for salmon fishing, and on several occasions went to Ireland with Mr. George Peabody, the American philanthropist. One day Mr. Bright, noticing a policeman on the bank, inquired of him what sum the boatman were entitled to ask for rowing up the Shannon on a day's fishing. He said that from seven shillings and sixpence to ten shillings was the usual payment.

Mr. Bright said to Mr. Peabody, "Have you three half-crowns? I have no change."

Mr. Peabody produced the money and gave it to the boatman. He was dissatisfied, and said:

"And is that all ye're giving me?"

"That is all," replied Mr. Peabody.

"Well, that bates all I iver heard," answered the boatman. "An' they call ye Paybody. Faith, I should call ye Pay-nobody!"

WITH corn and potatoes America has fed the world. The term "corn" is commonly used in the western hemisphere to mean "maize," or Indian corn, and not the rather generic expression under which all grains are included, according to English nomenclature. Indian corn has spread over the whole earth, till now it is a staple crop in Africa, in many parts of Europe, and even in Asia, where the original Indians cultivate it without knowing or perhaps caring whence it came. If it has not displaced it has at least supplemented rice, the great life-supporting grain, which from time immemorial has been grown in the far east; but Indian corn is an antipodal product, having come, as history teaches us, from the neighborhood of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, in North America.

The potato came originally from South America. But here it is necessary to pause a moment to state that what is really meant by the word potato is the plant and tuber vulgarly called the Irish or white potato, although it has no more relation to the Emerald Isle than that the good people there are very fond of it. The misnamed "sweet" potato has no right whatever to the title. That pleasant vegetable belongs to the morning-glory family, botanically being known as Ipomoea batatas, thus again betraying a fictitious relationship to the other family, because the batata is a native term for the real potato as well. Again, it is unjustly suspected that this sweet potato is the vegetable actually brought by Drake and Hawkins into England, where it masqueraded for some years as the genuine South American food of contemporary rumor. It must be understood, however, that the sweet potato is likewise a native of America, but its original home was probably the West Indies and Central America. At any rate, it grows in the tropics and subtropics and finds its climatic limitations at about the temperature and altitude at which the Irish potato begins to thrive. The yam is another appellation of the sweet potato, although that, too, is an error, for the yams—dioscoreae—belong to a group of climbing plants. A number of varieties are found throughout the tropics and subtropics, and they are cultivated in both the East and the West Indies. Other roots and tubers may resemble the potato, and the tomato is related to it, but they must not be confounded with the far better known vegetable, which alone is entitled to the name. The commercial and domestic classification is stronger, however, than the scientific, and therefore no attempt should be made to separate them in the popular mind.

The common, or white, or Irish potato is undoubtedly American all through. Its prehistoric and aboriginal habitat was the western slopes of the southern continent, from the neighborhood of Quito in Ecuador, or as some claim even from that of Bogota in Colombia, to the central region of Chile.

Botanically, the potato is a solanum, one of the most diversified plants of the vegetable kingdom. Something like 1,000 varieties have been described, but, assuming that several of these are not substantially accurate, there remain at least 800 which are well known. It is remarkable that only about 40 varieties have pinnate leaves and produce tubers on the roots beneath the ground, and that these special varieties are chiefly of American origin. All these tuberous, pinnate-leaved kinds of the solanum are nearly related and very probably have a common origin. This first habitat of the potato has been laid by some students, quite as much for the sake of poetic harmony as for historic exactitude, in Central America near the home of the primitive maize, but in all fairness South America deserves and will hold the honor.

The edible potato, from which all the European and American variations have been developed, was undoubtedly cultivated by even the inhabitants of the west coast of South America who occupied the land before the arrival of the Incas. When the Spanish conquerers arrived there, they found one great source of food supply in this native vegetable. In Peru, however, it was not a coast product, for the climate there semed unfavorable, and what happened to grow on the lower levels were small, insignificant and watery. The best kind of potato grew at an altitude of about 7,000 feet, back of Lima; it was small, round, with a thin skin, and was yellowish inside (papa amarilla). In southern Peru, not far from Mollendo, but among the foggy regions (June to September), up among the rocky hills, the potato has been found wild.

Passing farther along the coast into Chile, where the climate is quite temperate and consequently is suitable, even near the coast, for such vegetables, there is found that other form of the indigenous potato, the Maglia, which so attracted the attention of Darwin when he made his famous voyage in the Beagle. As far south as the Chonos Archipelago (about 45 degrees south) this plant grows wild near the sea. The potatoes from it resemble English potatoes, and have the same smell, but do not stand cooking so well. Little effort seems to have been made to develop the original tubers, although they form a good part of the food of the people, yet in this neighborhood the island of Chiloe alone has about 25,000 acres under cultivation, of the 123,000 acres devoted to potatoes in all Chile. That the Europeans found potatoes in Quito and Bogota need not be denied, but there is no strong reason for supposing that it was more than the same plant already mentioned, transported thither before they came.

Quite another story is uncovered along the coast of South America. There the potato is considered a European vegetable and is cultivated only by those whose experiences are derived from the old world. No tradition connects the few remaining natives with a past in which the potato flourished, and in the minor instances in which the "wild potato" has been found, experiment shows that it is inedible and perhaps even poisonous.

This is the case in the "wild potato" of Paraguay. Such a plant has for years been known to exist in the basin of the River Parana. It grows on the plains, budding in March and April, and ripening during the winter months of May to August. The tubers are about the size of a walnut and sometimes larger, soft and watery, full of irritating solania (the active alkaloid of the potato), and of a poor taste. They are not eaten nor are they cultivated; the so-called edible potato is considered an imported vegetable, foreign to native experience and judgment, while the vegetable that takes the place of potato in all native dietary is the "mandioca," which has been prepared as a food from time immemorial by the pre-Columbian inhabitants.

The food potato of commerce made its way, therefore, from its prehistoric home in the Andes to North America and via Europe to the eastern shores of South America.

Great credit belongs also to Sir Francis Drake, who learned of the potato about 1578, either in Peru itself or in some near-by island. He took specimens back with him, stopping first in Virginia, where he helped to plant them in 1585. In 1586 he arrived in England, carrying potatoes among his treasures, and thus the story arose that potatoes came from North America. Closely allied to this error that other, which confused the South American potato with what is now known as the sweet potato, the "batata," samples of which surely came from Virginia somewhat earlier than this time. It is probable that Drake gave potatoes to Raleigh. At any rate, it is an accepted statement that Sir Walter Raleigh was responsible for their use in Ireland, because he gave several to the grandfather of Sir Robert Southwell, who, to check the famine spreading in that island after the disastrous failure of the grain crop, cultivated them at once there, and popularized their use to his eternal credit.

John Gerard, a celebrated English botanist, grew them in England, following the example of Raleigh, who ordered his own gardener, with a utilitarian purpose, to cultivate them along with other vegetables. The story runs that this man, whose curiosity was intensely aroused by the new plant from America, watched its growth carefully, and when the fruit (sic) was ripe, gleefully plucked it from the stem and tasted it. As he found this part of the plant merely insipid, he spat it out in disgust, and complained to Sir Walter that he had wasted so much time upon the miserable thing: "Is this, then, your delicious fruit from America?" The reply startled the gardener, for he was told to drag up the offender by the roots, for fear that the other plants might be contaminated. On doing so, however, he was astonished to discover among them a mass of exactly the same kind of tubers he had planted in the spring. "Cook them," said Sir Walter Raleigh, "and then give me your opinion." At the first flavor of this strange vegetable he was delighted, and ever afterwards gave particular attention to increasing his supply of the wonderful potato.

By such experiences the potato was spread over Europe. In France it was a rare but prized vegetable in 1616; in Germany it was recognized in 1650, and from that time on, Europe, as well as other parts of the world, gradually accepted it as an addition to the food supply of all peoples. It is unwise to discuss here the mooted point about the so-called indigenous potato of Mexico and Arizona; about the origin of the S. commersonii in Uruguay and Argentina; for the settlement of it cannot disturb the fact that the Solanum tuberosum, the common potato of today, came from the west coast of South America, and that the natives of these regions must be given credit of having recognized its food value long before they were discovered by Europeans.

The widespread botanical order of the solanaceae, to which our potato belongs, embraces plants of little aparent similarity. There are, as members of the great family, among medicinal plants, for example, the hyoscyamus, dulcamara, belladonna, and datura; among food supplies are the thorn apple (a tree, in this case), the artichoke, and the tomato; and adding to man's enjoyment if not to his vital sustenance, the capsicum or the chile of commerce, and the American tobacco. Not many of them have tubers, however, and of the tubers, the potato holds the prize for its usefulness in human economy. The tuber of the plant we are interested in is the common potato.

Now, the tuber is a curious provision of nature which by propagation can be carried on by means of the regular and normal plant activity of the seed above ground, and also by anomalous stems, enlarged by the development, to an unusual degree, of cellular tissue, which are below the ground. Potatoes have seeds and fruit like any other member of the botanic kingdom, but when left to themselves it may happen that more energy is expended in storing up food in the tubers, so that flowers and seeds are imperfect. Theoretically it makes little difference which element—tuber or seed—is used for perpetuation of the potato, but practically so much encouragement has been given to the tuber that the seed is habitually ignored. Incidentally it deserves mention that the popular Burbank potato, the spread of which was one of the earliest demonstrations of the genius of the botanical wizard, Luther Burbank, was propagated from the seed, as he had noticed what splendid fruit certain plants were showing, and reasoned correctly that the product must equal the parent.

Exactly what the tuber is, is another question. By some its production is ascribed to a fungous iritation, although this is not proved. As has been said, not all the solanaceae have tubers, nor are all tubers members of the family. Be the cause what it may, the tuber is not a true root, but a leafless branch, usually below yet sometimes above the ground; the eyes on a tuber are leaf buds which in due time lengthen into shoots and form stems. The contents of a tuber are a reserve supply of food, supporting the young growth until it can put forth roots of its own.

The food supply in the potato, is shown by analysis to be about as follows:

	Parts.
Starch, etc.	18.8
Nitrogenous matters	2.1
Sugar	3.2
Fat	0.2
Salines	0.7
Water	75.0
Total	100.0

although of course variations in these proportions, depending upon soil, climate and methods of cultivation, are to be expected. It is evident, therefore, that the potato is not a perfect food, and that it lacks sufficient nitrogenous matter while having a superabundance of starch and sugar. That does not destroy its value nor its usefulness, by any means, nor its popularity, for next to Indian corn and rice, the potato is the most widely used vegetable in the world.

Today no hopeful settler, after trekking into a virgin wilderness, thinks his little garden complete without the pretty patch of potatoes; no domestic or public meal is served without its tuberous embellishment, and after mastering the art of boiling eggs, the next step of the young housewife is to learn how to prepare potatoes.

The grand total of potato production for one year amounts to about 5,500,000,000 bushels, and this gigantic crop comes from every continent in the world. Over one-fourth of the output is grown in Germany; not quite one-eighth from Russia; usually a little less even than that, from Austria-Hungary; about one-ninth from France; about one-sixteenth from Poland, and a slightly less quantity from (contiguous) United States.

In the United States, almost one-third of the year's crop is grown in the North Atlantic states, but the group of North Central states east of the Mississippi river runs a close second; of the other subdivisions, the Central states west of the Mississippi are next in importance, and the far Western states are fourth.

This illustrates one fact about the potato; it is very susceptible to climate and cultivation. Left to nature, it is only a moderately prolific plant, and cannot thrive in a country too hot or too cold, but has its habitat essentially in the temperate zone; on the other hand, it responds readily to good care, so that the more it is nursed the better does it grow.

The few rules to follow in successful potato growing can be learned by any farmer. First the soil must be suitable, but this is not hard to find. It must be light, so as to offer no great resistance to the enlargement of the tubers; well supplied with organic matter, yet no more than moist, and containing abundance of natural fertilizing ingredients. Well drained sandy loam is excellent; clay should be avoided. Crop rotation is advisable, as the potato bears well after certain preceding crops, but may wither if succeeding itself too regularly. Liberal manure is necessary, but of the right kind. The rows should be laid off as close together as practicable without interfering with horse cultivation, and generally speaking the seed pieces should be dropped about 12 inches apart in furrows made in the level field and not on the ridges, yet deep enough—say four inches—to afford ample cover to them. It must be mentioned that in speaking of potatoes the word "seed" means the tuber or portions cut from it in which an "eye" has formed; the botanical seed may be used, but no benefit is derived from that method; care must be taken, however, that the sprouts from the eye are not injured, and it is best, therefore to use eyes from which sprouts have not appeared.

The uses of the potato as a food have long ago been vindicated. Nothing can dislodge it. Not even the latest discovered dashen, a Japanese and Chinese claimant to tuberous popularity, will take its place, even though it may be proved to possess more protein than the South American predecessor. Whole books have been written on the culinery art of cooking the potato. Boiled, baked, stewed, or fried, it has been a garnishment to the more aristocratic dishes of every feast since it was discovered, and has supplied many a full meal to the humble masses who do the world's work. Nothing but a poem could tell its praises, and a sonnet is the least tribute through which our gratitude to Peru should be expressed.

As a source of industrial alcohol, especially that substance which is commercially known as denatured alcohol, potatoes are being regarded as of increasing value.

Next to food, however, the greatest value to mankind of the American potato is a source of starch. In this, too, it vies with corn. Potato starch is every year proving its merit, and whatever can provide starch, has a long popularity ahead of itself. Starch is one of the essentials of civilization. Its uses are protean, the demand for it is uncessing, and for both art and industry the supply must be constant. With such a varied field for its activity, therefore, no one should doubt that few blessings to humanity can surpass that which came to the world through the famous potato.

IMAGE SENT BY WIRE

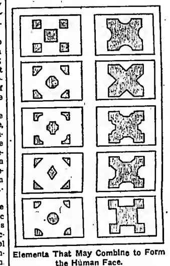
Recent French Invention That Opens Great Possibilities.

Photographs Can Be Sent by Telegraph With Great Accuracy and Some Speed Whenever Necessary Apparatus Exists.

Paris.—It has been possible for some time to send photographs by wire with great accuracy and some speed, wherever the necessary apparatus exists. Such transmission has for a year or so formed part of the regular Paris service of an enterprising London journal. Suppose, however, that a reporter finds himself at a country telegraph station and desires to send to his paper a picture of some kind in connection with his story—portrait, or the photograph of some building or locality. He is evidently no better off than he would have been a century ago. A recent process, however, the invention of a French engineer named Mortier, would make it possible for him to send his picture over a single wire, with the aid of the ordinary telegraphic instruments—or rather, it would enable him to telegraph data from which the picture could be built up at the receiving station. This process is described by R. Bounin in La Nature, where we read:

"Mortier's process requires neither costly and delicate apparatus nor any peculiar installation, nor a special wire. It will work anywhere, using under normal conditions the existing telegraphic plant of the smallest localities and without the least interference with its ordinary administration.

"What was necessary to obtain this result? First, to take up in a new form one of the original conceptions of Charles Cros, about 1869—the translation of images into a series of numbers, then to give to the symbolic numerical text a form that will make it transmissible by all telegraphs, with or without wires. Finally, to effect a typographic reconstruction of the image.



Elements That May Combine to Form the Human Face.

"The first thing to do is to cut the picture up into tiny squares, each one of which has the tone of the part of the image in which it is situated which tone is represented by a conventional figure serving for its telegraphic transmission. But this process, which has the inconvenience of being slow and uncertain, has been happily replaced by Mr. Mortier by the following, which may be called automatic:

"The picture to be transmitted is first printed in an enlarged form susceptible of easy analysis. This analytic print has two valuable properties—first, it is naturally cut up by a grillage of fine lines; secondly, the squares do not appear as more or less gray or transparent elements whose tone cannot be evaluated numerically, nor as groups of points whose light value can be stated in numbers only after a laborious measurement, but rather as black silhouettes against a white ground or vice versa, of forms so diversified as to embrace an extended scale of shades and so striking as to be identified at sight.

"These expressive figures arise spontaneously in the course of the manipulations, simple enough, that turn out the analytic proof. By what artifices has it been possible so to discipline the actinic force of the light that it shall express its own tonalities in characters more discernible than figures? The zoned cellular transparency, a simple sheet that has been placed in the printing frame between the original negative and the sensitive paper, before the printing of the analytic proof, operates this miracle by itself alone. At first sight this transparent sheet shows a simple marking in squares, but under the microscope the appearance of the network gives place to an arrangement of square cells of complex structure which reproduce exactly the typical outlines of the symbolic silhouettes of the preceding illustration.

"After the preparation of the print, the analysis of it amounts to no more than the simple reading of a page and the jotting down of the figures in order."

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Put "Laziest Boy in Chicago" on Diet

CHICAGO.—Three full hours before he had finished his daily thirteen hour snooze—or rather, daily-nightly snooze—Hermena Davis, 17 years old, "the laziest boy in Chicago," was rudely awakened from his snoring slumber shortly after 2 o'clock the other morning by a policeman at the home of the boy's grandmother. Hermann had not been disturbed before he had finished his sleep as far back as he could remember. He looked at the bluecoat, decided he could not be annoyed, and, rolling over, started once more to snore.

Another rough shake by the policeman brought the boy out of bed onto the floor, where he yawningly protested against such treatment and went back to sleep. Exasperated, the officer finally managed to keep the boy awake long enough to get him dressed and then took him to the Chicago avenue station, where his mother, Mrs. Ide McGraw, was pacing the office in a rage.

"There he is now!" she shouted angrily. "Look at him. He's the laziest boy in the world. I want him locked up and made to work."

Hermann looked wearied of it all and answered the accusations of his parent with stretches, yawns and sleepy blinkings.

"Look at this. This is what he does all day and night," and the woman thrust a piece of paper into the hands of the desk sergeant. It read:

"Rises at noon. Eats a hearty combination breakfast-lunch. Spends the afternoon at nickel theaters. Returns home to supper at six. Takes a nap until 7:30. Visits more nickel theaters. Retires to bed promptly at 10:30."

"We'll have to turn him over to Juvenile court officers," said the sergeant. "They'll put him on the 'no work, no eat' diet. He should be examined for the hook worm or the 'sleeping sickness.' I'll take charge of him."

He looked around for Hermsen. The boy was fast asleep in a chair in the corner. The mother fled.

Thought He Had Captured a Groundhog

TRENTON, N. J.—James Williams, a farm hand of White Horse, who is a firm believer in the ground hog weather theory, was put under the care of a physician as the consequence of his endeavor to capture the animal and keep him out of his hole, so that the six more weeks of winter would be eliminated. Williams' experience was such that he says he will never bother the ground hog again.

For several weeks Williams had boasted to friends that he had found the ground hog's hole and announced that when the proper time arrived he intended to insure the community good weather by forcing the animal to remain in the open, even if he did see his shadow.

Several volunteered to aid him in the capture, but Williams desired all the honor, and said he could perform the feat single handed. Before dawn he went to the supposed hole of the ground hog, about one and a half miles from White Horse, and waited.

It seemed a long time to dawn and the farm hand felt drowsy. He aroused himself and walked about the hole several times to keep awake, but was finally overcome, and before he knew it was sound asleep in the snow.

Williams arose with a start. The sun was brightly shining, and the snow swiftly melting about him. He gave one hurried glance into the hole and then quickly arose. Not ten feet from him he saw an animal walking leisurely in the direction of White Horse. He believed his ground hog was escaping, and immediately started in pursuit. He took the animal unawares, and the capture was easy.

Holding his prey under one arm he started for the village. When he was espied coming down the road with his captive there was a mighty cheer.

"Drop that skunk," the town constable shouted, as he dived into a cellar. The villagers scattered in all directions.

"Bumming" at 20 Below Not a Picnic

GEE!— THIS IS COLD!!!

ST. LOUIS.—John Vail, a postoffice robber who escaped jail at Macon one night early in January in an effort to escape a 3-year term in the penitentiary, was arrested at St. Charles. Vail, who is some 59 years old and fairly well educated, chose a bitter cold night to leave the jail and came near freezing to death while riding on the fender of a fast Kansas City-Chicago train. He told about his trip the other day.

"The night I escaped the temperature was about 20 degrees below zero," he said. "I went to the depot and when the passenger train from Kansas City to Chicago came in I climbed up on the tender. I didn't know how far it would run till it stopped, but supposed maybe ten or twelve miles.

"When we began to shoot down the grade east of town I realized I was up against it. The wind tore at me from four directions, it seemed, and my overcoat was thin and my gloves had holes in them. I didn't know whether I was going to be shaken off the tank and scattered along the right of way or frozen into a chunk of ice.

"Every time we hit a curve or jostled over a switch I would cling like death to my iron bed, and I knew if my fingers got stiff on me I was gone.

"At last I saw far down the track a red light and when the engine whistled the light wasn't changed. That meant stop! To me it was like seeing a sail after drifting all night on a raft in the ocean. I just could get my bones limber enough to climb down."

Mississippi Dog a Good Lion Hunter

NEW YORK.—To hear Paul J. Rainey tell about it, running down a full-grown lion with a pack of plain Mississippi dogs isn't half as dangerous as chasing a scared little red fox with a pack of fullblooded foxhounds—particularly if said fox takes it into his head to run over the property of an irate Long Island farmer, armed with a shotgun full of rock salt.

"When you run a lion down with dogs you carry a gun along, and all you've got to do is to use it after the dogs drive the lion into range," he says. "But when you are chasing Reynard the only one who has a gun is the irate farmer. So, me for the lions!"

The young American sportsman who stands sponsor for these sentiments has just returned from a year's hunting expedition in Africa. When he left here early in 1911 with his friend and companion on his famous Arctic trip, Dr. M. E. Johnson of Lexington, Ky., taking only a few guns and a pack of ordinary Mississippi hounds to go lion hunting his friends laughed at him.

Now that Mr. Rainey has the pelts of seventy-four full grown lions to wave in their faces they are eating so much humble pie that an epidemic of mental indigestion is threatened.

"The only difficulty was to train the dogs to take up the lion's scent," he said to a little group of apologetic ones who called at his offices.

"They didn't take kindly to the scent at first. I didn't blame them much, for a lion doesn't feed on clover or vanilla beans. But they got used to it after a while—and at the end of six weeks all you had to do was to show them the spoor of a lion and they would locate for you in half an hour."

PROMINENT PEOPLE

WILL LEAD FIGHT FOR TAFT

Selection of Representative William B. McKinley of Illinois, chairman of the Republican congressional committee, to lead the fight for delegates for President Taft to the Republican national convention at Chicago, is hailed as a drawing taut of the administration lines in an out and out contest between President Taft and Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. McKinley has hitherto been recognized as a standpatter of the Joseph G. Cannon type. The Taft men assert that Cannonism is dead and that the McKinley appointment is a recognition of the fact that the standpatters have now aligned themselves with the president, a middle of the road progressive Republican, as against the more radical progressives represented by Theodore Roosevelt and Senators La Follette and Cummins.

Mr. McKinley was selected to lead the Taft fight on the suggestion of Senator W. Murray Crane of Massachusetts, after a careful poll of the situation. The selection of Congressman McKinley to manage President Taft's campaign for re-election will make Illinois the center of the Roosevelt-Taft struggle.

MAYOR QUALIFIES AS A COOK

Descendants of Mayor Carter Harrison will be able to boast reminiscently of the "biscuits father used to make" and no one shall say them nay—for his honor the mayor is a culinary expert. He does not have to prove it; he admits it himself.

Mayor Harrison's skill with the skillet runs through a wide repertory from boiled eggs to reflector oven biscuits—in fact, there is no end to this man's cleverness until he essays jelly, then he meets the fate of all overly ambitious persons, disaster. Mrs. Harrison is responsible for the statement that the mayoral jelly is not all that could be desired.

The question as to Mayor Harrison's qualifications as a cook arose the other day during a lull in the city hall routine in which Mayor Gaynor's unhappy experience in criticising the cooking in New York's public schools was under discussion. The question of the cooking teachers of the metropolis' schools as to "what could any mere man know about cooking?" brought forth the mayoral ire, and with it the mayoral statement as to the mayoral ability.

"I have cooked for 20 years on hunting expeditions, and I think I can get away with it in great style. My biscuits are great. I have made them in a reflector oven in camp, and any one who can make biscuits in such an oven is all right."

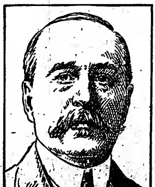
"DRUMMER BOY" TO RETIRE

A bill was introduced recently in the lower house of Congress by Mr. Ashworth of Ohio to retire with the rank of major general three of the best-known officers in the United States army. In the memorandum attached to the bill it is stated that "these three men, with a single exception, form the last remnant of that army of a million and a half men who fought for the preservation of the Union."

The exception referred to is Maj. Daniel W. Arnold of the quartermaster's department, who also retires by age limit next summer. However, he does not figure in the bill because of the fact that it was not until 36 years after Appomattox that he came into the army as an officer from civil life.

The three whose names are mentioned in Congressman Ashworth's bill and the combined total of whose services in the army add up to more than 150 years are Brig. Gen. Daniel H. Brush, commanding the department of California; Col. James N. Allison of Governors Island, and Col. John L. Clem, now on duty in Chicago. Colonel Clem is affectionately known to his comrades of the service as "Johnny Clem, drummer boy of Chickamauga."

NO "400" IN NEW YORK CITY



The question whether the visit of the duke and duchess of Connaught and their daughter, the Princess Patricia, will give social leaders a long-sought opportunity to decide who's who was put to Frederick Townsend Martin. He shook his head so decidedly that his mustache-ends vibrated.

"Not at all," he said, "the day of that necessity is long past. If it ever existed, it died with Ward McAllister. New York is too enormous for its society to be anything more than a network of cliques. The time was, years ago, when there were not more than a few hundred families of great wealth and cultivation here, that they all tried to stay together—to make a social unit. Now it is different. There is no '400' in New York today. It is a collection of one-hundreds or less, usually less.

"Neither Mrs. Mills nor Mrs. Reid, or, for that matter, any social leader, could entertain hundreds of persons at one time in the space at her disposal. New York houses are not big enough, and 'crushes' are no longer fashionable."

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

18,000 Miles of Postage Stamps a Year

THEY MUST DO A LOT OF LETTER WRITING ON MOTHER EARTH STAMPS
MARS

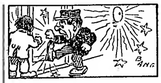
WASHINGTON.—If all the postage stamps issued by the United States government during the last fiscal year were collected and laid end to end they would form a chain over 18,000 miles long, stretching three-fourths around the world, or from New York to the Philippines and back. The number was 10,061,439,768, with a representing face value of $180,957,385.

Of the whole number 5,130,249,018 were two-cent stamps and 3,798,961,039 were one-cent. Only one thirty-cent stamp was issued.

The American postage stamp is now serving its sixty-sixth year, the first issue having been placed on sale July 1, 1847; the total issued during that year was 860,380. Prepayment of postage did not become compulsory until 1856.

The postage stamps of the current issue have given considerable trouble to the public and to the postal service on account of the similarity of the designs of the different denominations. All of the eleven denominations in use are of identical design, except that the one-cent bears the head of Franklin and the others the head of Washington. There are not a sufficient number of distinctive colors for all the stamps, making it necessary in the case of those above the six-cent to use different shades of the colors used in the lower denominations. Thus the one-cent and the eight-cent are different shades of green; the three-cent and fifty-cent different shades of purple; the five-cent and the fifteen-cent different shades of blue.

How Adee Turned the Joke on Himself



ASSISTANT Secretary of State Alvey A. Adee is one of the men in the government service who are said to be indispensable. He is a walking encyclopedia on matters diplomatic and can handle the most intricate affair of state with the confidence born of long and faithful service. His predecessor in his line of work held office for more than a generation and was such a public official as Mr. Adee.

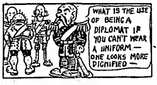
One of Mr. Adee's chief characteristics is his tremendous fund of good nature and stories concerning his official actions never grow old. One of the best stories told of him was a joke on the secretary himself which he never relished, although his intimate friends say he has privately admitted the humor of the situation.

When Mr. Adee gets down to serious work he does not like to be interrupted and at one stage in his official service he found interruptions so numerous he hit upon the scheme of putting a special lock upon the door of his office, the working of which he himself could control. One day he dismissed his secretary and messenger, carefully locked the door and got down to business.

In the course of the morning he wanted his messenger and rang the usual bell to call him. The messenger knocked at the door and received no response. When the bell rang a second time he called upon Mr. Adee's secretary to witness the fact that he had knocked again for entrance, but had not been received.

After one or two rings on the messenger call, which sounded like a small-sized fire alarm, Mr. Adee placed his finger on the button and kept it there. The result was consternation all over the state department. Poundings and kicks on the secretary's door brought no response and fears began to grow that he was seriously ill. In the end the combined office force had to break the door off its hinges and Mr. Adee was found sitting at his desk, angry and indignant that his calls had not been answered. The secret of the situation was that Mr. Adee had forgotten about the new lock and an impairment of his hearing had prevented him from answering the repeated knocking at his door.

Was Not the First to Wear a Uniform



WHAT IS THE USE OF BEING A DIPLOMAT IF YOU CAN'T WEAR A UNIFORM— ONE LOOKS MORE DIGNIFIED—

THE accounts of Ambassador Leishman's resplendent court costume of navy blue with gold braid created very little stir in Washington. Public men have ceased to have the old-fashioned interest in the government's representatives abroad. Few even keep in mind the names of the constantly shifting procession of diplomats, and it is only when an international affair of some proportions arises that the average senator or congressman takes the trouble to recall what particular individual represents the United States at any particular court.

There was here and there a man who had something to say of the incident. The many, however, neither knew Mr. Leishman nor cared how he might choose to dress at a court function. But at the state department, where Mr. Leishman is known, and it is the daily business of everybody to know diplomats and be interested in everything they may chance to be doing, there was no surprise at the navy blue shade of the Leishman uniform.

On all sides officials were fortified with precedents for wearing various sorts of clothes at state functions abroad. Mr. Breckinridge, who, in Arkansas, wore homespun trousers, put on white silk stockings and knee breeches at the coronation of the czar and got along very well at that except for the snickering of the ladies at the attenuated condition of the ministerial calves. Theodore Runyan, who at one time held some sort of a commission in the New Jersey militia that gave warrant for a uniform, served his country as minister to Germany during the last Cleveland administration, and put that old militia uniform on and wore it to a court reception with great success.

Young Congressman's Dates Were Mixed

AND AH— WHAT AGE DID YOU MASTER LATIN —??
?

A STRANGER entered the office of Representative William S. Reyburn of Philadelphia, who broke a lot of youngest congressman records by landing in the lower house last spring at the age of twenty-eight.

"You knew your multiplication table by the time you were a year and a half old, I presume?" he suggested.

"Oh, certainly!" said Reyburn, deeming it wise to humor the fellow and avoid a scene.

"And at what age had you mastered Latin grammar?" pursued the investigator. "Five years perhaps?"

"Somewhere around there," nodded Reyburn.

"And as you grew older," went on the visitor, "that is, when you got to be nine or ten years of age, which of your college studies appealed to you most?"

At first the man's talk had been merely funny, but now it looked serious and Reyburn became nervous.

"Say, what are you getting at?"

"Why, naturally your case interested me, and many other earnest students of psychology," replied the visitor, quietly. "Any young man who could finish college at the age of twelve seemed to us—"

"Hold on there!" exclaimed Reyburn. "Wey-tay-minute! Who was it told you such bughouse stuff that I finished college at the age of twelve?"

"Why, I saw it in your biography in the 'Congressional Directory.'"

Reyburn seized the directory on his desk and turned to the page where it says he was born in 1882 and was graduated from Yale in 1894. It was the first time his attention had been called to the misprint. The latter date should have read 1904.

MEN TEACHERS.

Recently there has been much discussion in educational circles of the need of men teachers in the higher grades, and some effort has been made to attract them to the work, without any appreciable results. There must be something about the calling of the teacher—either its pecuniary rewards or its range of opportunities—that is inadequate to attract and hold men who might take up this calling as a life work. The average man teacher uses his position as a makeshift, a stepping-stone and means of livelihood while he studies for the law, the medicine or some other profession, says the St. Paul Pioneer Press. Usually the man teacher leaves at the earliest opportunity for more flattering and lucrative fields of endeavor. It would seem that teaching would be the most enjoyable work for the student of books and of human nature, but the fact remains that men as a rule do not so regard it. It must be admitted that the profession of teaching does not hold the financial attractions of men that are offered in other professions. The years of preparation required, the constant study necessary, the investment in books and other expenses make a severe drain on the teacher's income, which is small at best. If it be true that there is a real demand for more men teachers, the chances are that the demand will be supplied when the compensation is made commensurate with the services rendered.

The statistics of the fire department of New York show that at least 25 per cent of the fires in that city are caused by the careless use of matches and of lighted cigars and cigarettes. Is it not time that this awful risk to others by careless smokers should be taken account of by the law? It is not a trivial matter. The tossing aside of lighted matches and cigar butts without seeing where they land should be as much of a penal offense as bomb-throwing or incendiarism. A careless cigarette, as far as known, caused the great fire in Baltimore, one of the biggest in the world's history and wholly preventable. A careless match caused the recent fire in New York, with its loss of valuable life and much loss of property—also wholly preventable. The careless user of a spark of fire is an enemy of the public welfare and ought to be treated as such. We are as yet primitive in our outlook upon vital facts.

A very pleasant prediction has been made by a college sociologist that the United States is due for war in 1930 and that this nation will be in the wrong, as probably by reason of its wealth and importance, it will have become an international bully. He bases this assertion on the evidence of history. But to offset this are the facts that the direct rule of the people is becoming more and more the national ideal of government, and that with the people as a whole vitally in control, the peace sentiment will be stronger than ever. It is upon the masses, not the classes, that the horrors of war chiefly fall, and the element of self-interest will then be more engaged in the preservation of peace than ever before in the history of the world. In the meantime, potential academic wars need not seriously affect the national peace of mind.

Professor von Wasserman has informed the Berlin Medical Society of amazingly successful experience in treating cancerous ulcers in mice with injections of a preparation containing eosin, tellurium and selenium. He says that after the fourth injection ulcerous affections almost entirely disappeared, and at the end of ten days some of the animals were entirely cured. But he is not certain, he says, that similar results would be attainable in the case of human beings.

A Harvard professor says that divorce is symptomatic of a disease which he calls Americanitis and has something to do with nerves. He is probably right, for there is never a divorce unless one party gets on the nerves of the other.

If, as a French physician charges, a man can get rid of his superfluous flesh by eating five liberal meals per day, are we to infer that an emaciated person can make himself fat by starving?

A woman in a western city jumped upon the stage in a moving picture show and by singing stopped a panic in the audience. There are some things more startling than an alarm of fire

---

One hundred and eighty-five murders were committed in Chicago in the year which ended December 31, 1911—an average of more than one a day. No wonder there are those who call Chicago "the Wicked City."

First Time in History, According to Report of Cabinet Officer.

RAISE IN RATES IS FAVORED

President Concurs in Recommendation of Commission on Second-Class Mail Matter—Again Suggests Adoption of Parcel Post System.

Washington, Feb. 22.—For the first time in the history of the postal service that department of the government showed a profit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, according to the annual report of Postmaster General Hitchcock transmitted to congress today. Accompanying the document was the report of the commission on second-class mail matter appointed by joint resolution of congress on March 4 of last year and a brief message of the president, in which he called attention to the principal features of the two reports.

Would Increase Second-Class Rates.

The report of the commission on second-class mail matter makes the following recommendations:

1. The rate of 2 cents a pound on copies mailed by publishers to subscribers, to news agents, and as sample copies, and by news agents to their subscribers or to other news agents.

2. The rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces for copies mailed by other than publishers and news agents; that is, the present transient rate.

3. The present free-in-county privilege retained, but not extended.

The commission also recommended that the cent-a-copy rate for newspapers other than weeklies and for periodicals not exceeding 2 ounces in weight, and the 2-cent-a-copy rate for periodicals exceeding 2 ounces in weight, when mailed at a city letter-carrier office for local delivery, be abolished.

As to the effect and adequacy of the proposed increase of 1 cent a pound in postage the commission says:

"Such an increase will not, in the opinion of the commission, bring distress upon the publishers of newspapers and periodicals, or seriously interfere with the dissemination of useful news or information. A reasonable time should be allowed, after the rate is fixed, before it is put into effect. While the new rate will be very far from compensating the government for the carriage and handling of second-class matter, it will to some extent relieve the existing burden and result in a more equitable adjustment of rates."

Both the president and the postmaster general concur in the recommendations and regarding the proposed increase in newspaper postage the president says: "The proposed increase of 1 cent a pound in the second-class postage rate, I believe, to be most reasonable, and if sufficient time is allowed before the change goes into effect it should work little serious injury to the business of the periodical publishers, while equalizing, at least in a measure, the burdens of postal taxation."

Rates Should Be More Equal.

Commenting further on the proposed increase, the president says: "The postal service is now, for the first time in years, operated upon a self-sustaining basis, and in my judgment this is a wise policy; but it should not be carried out at the expense of certain classes of mail matter that pay revenue largely in excess of their cost. It is not just that some classes of mail should be exorbitantly taxed to meet a deficiency caused by other classes, the revenue from which is much below their cost of handling and carriage. Where such inequalities exist they should be removed as early as practicable. The business enterprises of the publishers of periodicals, however, have been built up on the basis of the present second-class rate, and therefore it would be manifestly unfair to put into immediate effect a large increase in postage. That newspapers and magazines have been potent agencies for the dissemination of public intelligence and have consequently borne a worthy part in the development of the country all must admit; but it is likewise true that the original purpose of congress in providing for them a subvention by way of nominal postal charges in consideration of their value as mediums of public information ought not to prevent an increase, because they are now not only educational but highly profitable. There is no warrant for the great disparity between existing postage rates on periodicals and the cost of the service the government performs for them. The aggregate postal revenues for the fiscal year 1911 were $237,879,823.60, derived mainly from the postage collected on the four classes of mail matter. It is carefully estimated by the postoffice department that the revenue derived from mail matter of the first class is approximately one and one-half times the cost of handling and carriage; that the returns from third and fourth class matter are slightly in excess of their cost of handling and carriage; and that while second-class matter embraces over 65 per cent. of the entire weight of all the mail carried, it, nevertheless, yields little more than 5 per cent. of the postal revenues."

The commission on second-class mail matter consisted of Hon. Charles E. Hughes, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University, and Mr. Harry A. Wheeler, president of the Association of Commerce of the city of Chicago. In commenting on their findings the president says:

"The report discloses a most exhaustive and critical inquiry into the subject of second-class mail matter after adequate notice to all the parties in interest. Extensive hearings were held by the commission, at which the Postmaster General and the Second and Third Assistant Postmasters General appeared and submitted formal statements presenting the various contentions of the Post Office department, together with all the relevant official data and evidence relating to the cost of handling and transporting second-class mail matter. Certain of the leading magazines were represented by counsel, while various other publications appeared by representatives.

"The findings of the commission confirm the view that the cost of handling and transporting second-class mail matter is greatly in excess of the postage paid, and that an increase in the rate is not only justified by the facts, but is desirable."

Cost Inquired Into.

"The commission reports that the evidence submitted for its consideration is sufficient to warrant a finding of the approximate cost of handling and transporting the several classes of second-class mail known as paid-at-the-pound-rate, free-in-county, and transient matter, in so far as relates to the services of transportation, post-office cars, railway distribution, rural delivery, and certain other items of cost, but that it is without adequate data to determine the cost of the general post-office service and also what portion of the cost of certain other aggregate services is properly assignable to second-class mail matter. It finds that in the fiscal year 1908, the period for which the statistics for the Post Office Department were compiled, the cost of handling and transporting second-class mail, in the items of transportation, post-office cars, railway distribution, rural delivery, and certain miscellaneous charges, was approximately 6 cents a pound for paid-at-the-pound-rate matter, and for free-in-county and transient matter each approximately 5 cents a pound, and that upon this basis, as modified by subsequent reductions in the cost of railroad transportation, the cost of paid-at-the-pound-rate matter, for the services mentioned, is now approximately 5½ cents a pound, while the cost of free-in-county and transient matter remains as formerly, namely, each at approximately 5 cents a pound.

The commission suggests that the department "maintain an adequate cost system, so that the effect of the new rates may be closely observed and a proper basis may be secured for the consideration of any future proposals."

President Taft again concurs in the recommendation of the Postmaster General for the adoption of a parcel post system, suggesting the inauguration of such a service on rural routes and in the city delivery service first.

Ownership of Telegraph Opposed.

Hitchcock's recommendation for government ownership of the telegraph lines under the supervision of the postal service is not approved of by the president. Regarding this he says:

"There is only one recommendation in which I can not agree—that is one which recommends that the telegraph lines in the United States should be made a part of the postal system and operated in conjunction with the mail system. This presents a question of government ownership of public utilities which are now being conducted by private enterprise under franchises from the government. I believe that the true principle is that private enterprise should be permitted to carry on such public utilities under due regulation as to rates by proper authority rather than that the government should itself conduct them. This principle I favor because I do not think it in accordance with the best public policy thus greatly to increase the body of public servants. Of course, if it could be shown that telegraph service could be furnished to the public at a less price than it is now furnished to the public by telegraph companies, and with equal efficiency, the argument might be a strong one in favor of the adoption of the proposition. But I am not satisfied from any evidence that if these properties were taken over by the government they could be managed any more economically or any more efficiently or that this would enable the government to furnish service at any smaller rate than the public are now required to pay by private companies."

The report of the Postmaster General is full of statements of changes in the organization and methods of the postal service made since the last annual report, and of tentative drafts of legislation embodying certain recommendations of the department which need legislation to carry them out. It also calls attention to the fact that the revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, amounted to $237,879,823.60 and that the expenditures amounted to $237,660,705.48, making a surplus of $219,118.12.

The report shows that the postal savings system was begun experimentally in January, 1911, and that it has now been extended so as to include 7,500 presidential post offices, which includes practically all of the post offices of that class. Preparations are also being made to establish the system at about 40,000 fourth-class offices The deposits in 11 months have reached a total of $11,000,000, distributed among 2,710 national and state banks

ROBBED OF $25,000

HEART OF NEW YORK'S FINANCIAL DISTRICT IS SCENE OF DARING HOLDUP.

VICTIMS BADLY BEATEN

Three Highwaymen Leap Into Machine—Secure Loot and Then Make Their Escape in a Waiting Automobile.

New York, N. Y. — Twenty-five thousand dollars in currency was stolen from a taxicab in the heart of the financial district by three highwaymen, who sprang into the vehicle and overpowered W. F. Smith and Frank Wardell, messengers of the East River National bank. Both messengers were badly injured and the robbers escaped with the money, $15,000 in $5 bills and $10,000 in $100 bills. The currency was being transported from the Produce Exchange bank in the lower part of the city.

The taxicab had proceeded up Broadway without mishap when, for some unexplained reason, the chauffeur turned west on Rector street into Church street, skirting the side and rear of Trinity churchyard.

About midway of the old cemetery three men sprang from the curb. One jumped on the chauffeur's seat; the other two got into the vehicle. The man on the seat pressed a revolver in his overcoat pocket against the side of the chauffeur, Gino Martini, and commanded him to drive swiftly on without making an outcry.

Inside the vehicle the two robbers were belaboring the bank messengers over the head. Smith, one of the messengers, is 61 years old, and he was bleeding, and almost unconscious when the taxicab reached Park place, a few blocks north. Wardell was badly beaten about the head, but was not so seriously hurt.

At Park place the highwaymen jumped from the taxicab, bearing a tin box which they had wrested from the messengers, and which contained the currency. In a flash they had sprung into a big black automobile which appeared to be awaiting their coming and were quickly lost in the maze of traffic.

Martini, the taxicab chauffeur, continued to run his machine until he found a policeman. Here he gave the alarm and the two injured messengers were taken to a police station. Smith's condition was so serious that he was removed to a hospital. Wardell's scalp was badly lacerated, but because of his youth he stood the fight well.

The taxi was owned and driven by Gino Martini and had been used many times by the officials of the East River bank to transfer cash and securities. Martini told the police that he did not suspect any danger, even when the men leaped into the cab, as he thought they might simply want to ride.

"The man who got by me," he said, "jabbed the gun into my side. 'Keep on a-going,' he hissed at me, 'and if you make a sound or turn, I'll fill you full of lead.' When I felt the gun against my ribs, I gave the car the power. Then I heard the door slam, and I could feel the struggle going on inside the cab, but I did not dare look around.

"We whizzed past two policemen, but I was so scared that I was afraid to make a sound. As I neared Park place the man beside me said: 'Slow down and stop at the corner.' I did as I was told and he jumped off and streaked for the black automobile that was standing there. I felt the door of the taxi open and I saw the other two men jump out and run over to the car, the engine of which had been started. They disappeared before I could tell anybody what had happened."

After questioning Martini at length, the police took him and his taxicab to headquarters. There the fingerprint experts of the department went over the machine in an effort to find fingerprints which might give them a clue.

MECCA FOR THE BLIND AND DEAF.

A Hospital for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Established At White Bear Lake.

Prominent St. Paul specialists have taken over the White Bear Hospital and are the first to give Minnesota and the N. W. an institution exclusively devoted to the care of Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat diseases. The Hospital has an accommodation for forty-five patients, is steam heated, electric lighted and has a modernly equipped operating room. It is beautifully located on the shores of White Bear Lake, free from the din and roar of the city and easily reached by steam and electric cars. The reputation and large practice of the physicians in charge are too well known in the Northwest to need any recommendation. That the Minnesota Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Hospital will be welcomed by the people of the Northwest is evident by the number of patients that are already coming from long distances to secure the services of these specialists as well as the conveniences of this up-to-date hospital.—"White Bear Life."

AKED EQUAL TO SITUATION

Example of the Soft Answer That Turneth Away Wrath—Also the Truth.

One of Dr. Aked's most ardent supporters when that divine was pastor of Mr. John D. Rockefeller's church is fond of telling what he considers a striking example of Dr. Aked's wit.

Dr. Aked was fond of taking long country walks, and one day, being far in the country and wandering through a field, he and his friends noticed a sign nailed to a tree. "No trespassing here."

Hurrying to get out of the forbidden ground they met a farmer who assailed them grimly with the remark:

"Trespassers in this field are prosecuted."

Dr. Aked smiled at the irate farmer.

"But we are not trespassers, my good man," said he.

"What be you then?" demanded the farmer.

"We are Presbyterians, my dear sir," replied Dr. Aked and walked away.

CHILD'S HEAD A MASS OF HUMOR

"I think the Cuticura remedies are the best remedies for eczema I have ever heard of. My mother had a child who had a rash on its head when it was real young. Doctor called it baby rash. He gave us medicine, but it did no good. In a few days the head was a solid mass, a running sore. It was awful; the child cried continually. We had to hold him and watch him to keep him from scratching the sore. His suffering was dreadful. At last we remembered Cuticura Remedies. We got a dollar bottle of Cuticura Resolvent, a box of Cuticura Ointment, and a bar of Cuticura Soap. We gave the Resolvent as directed, washed the head with the Cuticura Soap, and applied the Cuticura Ointment. We had not used half before the child's head was clear and free from eczema, and it has never come back again. His head was healthy and he had a beautiful head of hair. I think the Cuticura Ointment very good for the hair. It makes the hair grow and prevents falling hair." (Signed) Mrs. Francis Lund, Plain City, Utah, Sept. 19, 1910.

Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston.

SAVED FROM AN OPERATION

How Mrs. Reed of Peoria, Ill., Escaped The Surgeon's Knife.

Peoria, Ill.—"I wish to let every one know what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. For two years I suffered. The doctor said I had a tumor and the only remedy was the surgeon's knife. My mother bought me Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and today I am a well and healthy woman. For months I suffered from inflammation, and your Sanative Wash relieved me. I am glad to tell anyone what your medicines have done for me. You can use my testimonial in any way you wish, and I will be glad to answer letters."—Mrs. CHRISTINA REED, 105 Mound St., Peoria, Ill.

Mrs. Lynch Also Avoided Operation.

Jessup, Pa.—"After the birth of my fourth child, I had severe organic inflammation. I would have such terrible pains that it did not seem as though I could stand it. This kept up for three long months, until two doctors decided that an operation was needed.

"Then one of my friends recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and after taking it for two months I was a well woman."—Mrs. JOSEPH A. LYNCH, Jessup, Pa.

Women who suffer from female ills should try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, one of the most successful remedies the world has ever known, before submitting to a surgical operation.

Evil of Idleness.

Work develops all the good there is in a man; idleness all the evil. Work sharpens all his faculties and makes him thrifty; idleness makes him lazy and a spendthrift. Work surrounds a man with those whose habits are industrious and honest; in such society a weak man develops strength, and a strong men is made stronger. Idleness, on the other hand, is apt to throw a man into the company of men whose object in life is usually the pursuit of unwholesome and demoralizing diversions.—Darius Ogden Mills.

REAL ESTATE

THE MOST PRODUCTIVE LAND of Western Canada lies in the Province of Saskatchewan, more particularly in the Melville district at the junction of the Main Line of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Hudson Bay Railroad, other railroad lines also being constructed through the district. 44 Bu. to the Acre

is a heavy yield, but that's what John Kennedy of Edmonton, Alberta, Western Canada, got from 40 acres of Spring Wheat in 1910. Reports from other districts in that province showed other excellent results—such as 4,000 bushels of wheat from 120 acres, or 33 1-3 bu. per acre. 25, 30 and 40 bushel yields were numerous. As high as 132 bushels of oats to the acre were threshed from Alberta fields in 1910.

The Silver Cup at the recent Spokane Fair was awarded to the Alberta Government for its exhibit of grains, grasses and vegetables. Reports of excellent yields for 1910 come also from Saskatchewan and Manitoba in Western Canada.

Free homesteads of 160 acres, and adjoining pre-emptions of 160 acres (at $3 per acre) are to be had in the choicest districts.

Schools convenient, climate excellent, soil the very best, railways close at hand, building lumber cheap, fuel easy to get and reasonable in price, water easily procured, mixed farming a success.

ROOSEVELT SAYS HE WILL ACCEPT

THE COLONEL DECLARES HE WILL ADHERE TO DECISION UNTIL CONVENTION.

REPLIES TO 7 GOVERNORS

Former Executive Reiterates Desire to Have People of Each State Signify by a Primary Election Their Choice of President.

FOUR YEARS AGO.

Nov. 8, 1908.—"On the fourth of March next, I shall have served three and a half years and this three and half years constitute my first term. The wise custom which limits the president to two terms regards the substance and not the form and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination."

New York, Feb. 26.—"I will accept the nomination for president if it is offered me and I will adhere to this decision until the convention has expressed its preference," is Colonel Roosevelt's reply to the letter of seven Republican governors asking him to stand for nomination.

The eagerly awaited reply was unexpectedly brief, but definite. It follows:

"New York, Feb. 24, 1912.

"Gentlemen: I deeply appreciate your letter and I realize to the full the heavy responsibility it puts upon me, expressing as it does the carefully considered convictions of the men elected by popular vote to stand as the heads of government in their several states.

"I absolutely agree with you that this matter is not one to be decided with any reference to the personal preferences or interests of any man, but purely from the standpoint of the interests of the people as a whole. I will accept the nomination for president if it is tendered to me and I will adhere to this decision until the convention has expressed its preference.

"One of the chief principles for which I have stood, for which I now stand and which I have always endeavored and always shall endeavor to reduce to action, is the genuine rule of the people; and therefore I hope that so far as possible the people may be given the chance, through direct primaries to express their preference as to who shall be the nominee of the Republican presidential convention.

"Very truly yours,
"Theodore Roosevelt.

"The Hon. Herbert S. Hadley, governor of the state of Missouri, Jefferson City, Mo."

Letter Drafted to Roosevelt.

The above named governors assembled at Chicago two weeks ago and drafted a letter to Colonel Roosevelt, asserting that there was a popular demand for him to be president again, and urging him to declare himself as to whether he would accept the Republican nomination if "it came unsolicited and unsought." For two weeks Colonel Roosevelt considered the letter.

Chicago Comments.

Chicago. — Definite announcement from Colonel Roosevelt that he will accept the presidential nomination if offered him without his becoming an active candidate caught no one napping in Chicago and took no one by surprise.

At the Roosevelt headquarters where foreword of the Colonel's announcement had sped, the leaders only smiled. At the Taft headquarters there were smiles, too, smiles because the suspense had ended, although there were none who doubted the outcome of the appeal of the seven western governors addressed to the former president.

Democrats interviewed all united in declaring that in their opinion Roosevelt's nomination will make for a certain Democratic victory. Practically all of them voiced the same views as did Mayor Carter H. Harrison.

Brother Charles Not Scared.

Cincinnati.—After reading the statement of Colonel Theodore Roosevelt that he would accept the nomination if it was tendered, Charles P. Taft, brother of President Taft, said: "I don't think Mr. Roosevelt will get the nomination. In fact I am positive we will beat him. Mr. Roosevelt has made himself unpopular with the Republican party by his speech at Columbus." Mr. Taft said that was his own personal opinion.

MINNESOTA TAX LAW UPHELD

GROSS EARNINGS EXPRESS COMPANIES VALID.

Pointed Out These Duties Are Not a Burden Upon Interstate Trade.

Washington, D. C. — Saying that "we find no error in the judgment of the supreme court of the state of Minnesota," Justice Day of the supreme court of the United States affirmed the opinion of the supreme court of Minnesota in upholding the gross earnings tax law of that state as applied to taxes upon earnings of express companies.

This case was brought by the United States Express company to test the validity of the Minnesota law.

The law provides for a tax of 6 per cent on the gross earnings of express companies and in reaching the conclusion that the law is valid, the supreme court differentiates between laws having for their basis the measuring of what taxes shall be, rather than the source of the income. Such taxes point that gross earnings tax laws like those of Minnesota do not constitute a burden upon interstate commerce.

This decision by Justice Day was the unanimous opinion of the court, no dissent being announced. The decision reviews the passage of the Minnesota gross earnings tax law and cites the different classes of receipts of express earnings, including express business done wholly within the state and part within and without the state; also that business which is conducted under conditions where consignments are made to consignees within the state but pass over lines of railroads traversing territory outside of the state. After reviewing the decision of the state court and a variety of opinions given by the supreme court of the United States in other cases of like character, having a greater or less bearing upon the principles involved in this case, the court sustains the decision of the supreme court of Minnesota upholding the validity of the gross earnings tax law, as applied to the taxes assessed in this case.

Minnesota will be able to recover approximately $1,000,000 in back taxes as a result of the court's decision.

The court in another decision held a similar law in Oklahoma unconstitutional because it was found to be more of a tax on property and was distinguished from the Minnesota case on that ground.

Only congress and not the supreme court of the United States may object to the initiative and referendum method of legislation in the states, so the court itself decided.

That tribunal held that the question of whether a state still maintained a Republican form of government guaranteed by the federal constitution after it adopted the initiative and referendum method, was a political problem for congress and not a judicial one for the courts.

The decision was based on the claim of the Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph company that a tax upon it, imposed by the initiative and referendum method in Oregon, was unconstitutional. The initiative and referendum provisions in Missouri, California, Arkansas, Colorado, South Dakota, Utah, Montana, Oklahoma, Maine and Arizona, hung in the balance. An adverse decision would have affected proposed legislation of that character in many other states.

Confusion in several states as to the time given to a borrower of money from a national bank in which to sue the bank for collecting usurious interest was set at rest when the supreme court decided that the time is to be measured from the date of the actual payment of usury and not from the date of making of the usurious contract. The point arose in the suit of Patrick B. McCarty against the First National bank of Rapid City.

SURGEON TESTIFIES

Dr. Polk Richards Tells of Indians' Physical Condition.

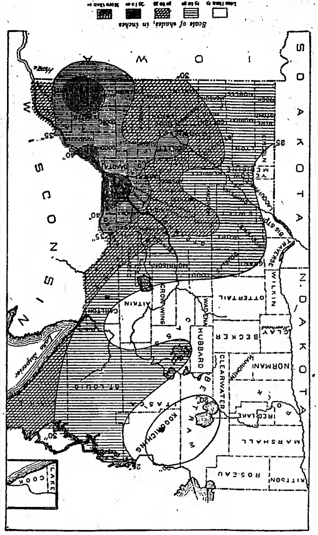
Detroit. — Dr. Polk Richards, government physician at the White Earth agency, testified with respect to health conditions on the reservation. He said that beginning in 1910 a canvass was made of the Indians, though not complete, showing that about 20 or 25 per cent had tuberculosis, the most common form of which was scrofula, and that 60 per cent had trachoma. The number already examined was given as 3,733, those having trachoma as 2,315, those having tuberculosis, 520, and the blind, 128. An estimate of the venereally affected, not based on record, was 25 per cent.

Uncleanliness, poor ventilation of houses, and lack of food were predisposing causes of tuberculosis among the Indians, Dr. Richards said. Conditions at Pine Point, he said, could not be worse for the spread of tuberculosis. Many would be blind if nothing were done to treat the trachoma. The old and the blind, he thought, should be cared for in homes and hospitals.

Light Lumber Cut in Minnesota.

Duluth. — Although weather conditions this past winter have been almost ideal for logging, the cut in Northern Minnesota will not be as heavy as in some former years. Two reasons are given—the cut on burned-over land the last two seasons was heavy and some of the companies are well stocked. Last fall the market was drooping and some of the larger operators did not make plans for a heavy cut. The streams north already are showing open water and an early drive is anticipated.

COMPARATIVE RAINFALL IN 1911 IN MINNESOTA IS SHOWN IN MAP



Minnesota's precipitation figures for 1911 are condensed by Section Director U. G. Purssell of the weather bureau in his meteorological summary in the form of a state map. By different lines the map indicates amounts of precipitation up to twenty-five inches for the year, between twenty-five and thirty inches, thirty and thirty-five inches, thirty-five inches and forty inches, and more than forty.

Mr. Purssell's summary reads:

The average precipitation was 29.10 inches, which was 3.65 inches above the normal. The greatest annual amount was 51.53 inches at Grand Meadow, and the least 19.26 inches at Red Lake. The greatest monthly amount was 13.34 inches at Grand Meadow in August, and the least, trace at Fairmount, Glencoe and Worthington in March, and at Pipestone in November. The greatest rainfall occurring in any twenty-four consecutive hours was 6.41 inches at Grand Meadow on Aug. 13. The average snowfall was 47.7 inches. There was an average of ninety-three days on which 0.01 inch, or more, of rain or melted snow fell. Snow fell in the state every month except in July and August.

The precipitation was nearly double that of 1910. It was three inches less than that of 1905, which was the wettest year, with an average of 33.10 inches. The average precipitation for January, February, July, August, September, October and December was above the normal, and for March, April, May, June and November below, making a total of 3.65 inches above normal.

SILK BEGINS HIS WORK

Cass County Promoter Starts Early to Get State Fair Exhibit.

Cass Lake.—George J. Silk, of Pine River, who has been appointed by the county commissioners to have charge of the Cass County exhibit at the State fair, was in Cass Lake last night on business connected with the exhibit. Mr. Silk is canvassing the county, making arrangements at this early day with people to make exhibits next fall, and also is getting subscriptions for a booklet advertising the resources of the county, which is to be distributed from the State fair booth and also from Northern Minnesota Development association headquarters. He reports that he is meeting with success.

HAS SOCIALIST MAYOR

Third Party Successful in Bemidji Election.

Bemidji.—Fred Malzan was elected mayor here on the Socialist ticket at the city election held on a platform calling for a higher saloon license, by a margin of 24 votes over his nearest competitor, William McCuaig, in a field of four candidates. The Socialist party also elected one alderman in the person of E. W. Hanna.

MURDERED HIS SQUAW

Chief Log-ga-ge-shij of the Cass Lake Chippewas, Denies Charge.

Bemidji.—Murder in the first degree is the charge which Chief Log-ga-ge-shij, the Cass Lake Chippewa faces as a result of the death of his wife.

A coroner's jury here returned a verdict that the squaw came to her death by blows delivered by her husband. The couple had been in Cass Lake and both had been drinking.

At the inquest it was shown that the woman had been badly mutilated, her hair having been pulled out by the handful. The chief is in the Beltrami county jail. He says his squaw fell from the sleigh on the way home and that as she could not get back in he threw her a blanket and went on his way because he was afraid of the cold.

Pipestone Seeks Recognition.

Pipestone. — Superintendent W. G. Balcom of the city schools has made application to have the Pipestone high school placed upon the list of the North Central association of colleges and secondary schools. If granted, graduates of the Pipestone school can enter any college or university in the northwest without taking entrance examinations.

Cass Lake Will Advertise.

Cass Lake. — The advertising committee and directors of the Commercial club met and let the contract for furnishing the advertising booklet which they are issuing. The booklet will contain thirty photographs of scenes in and around Cass Lake.

Around the Clock at Minneapolis.

Minneapolis.—The attraction announced at the Bijou for week of March 3d is "Around the Clock," which should, by reason of its remarkable reputation, mean a week of capacity business.

Bright Prospects for School.

Winnebago.—President Du Bois of the Methodist college here, recently taken over from the Free Baptists, has gone east on business connected with the school. On his return he will attend a joint meeting of the university, senate and college boards at Minneapolis. Many inquiries are being received from prospective students. Military drills will be given the boys in the school work, which opens next fall, and there is a possibility that all of the boys may be uniformed the second year.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879.

One year from next Monday "Reciprocity" Tuft will take a walk out of the white house. No matter who takes his place the people are sure to not get cheated. Republican, Democrat, Socialist, Prohibition, anything but Tuft.

The twin city dailies are making frantic efforts to get circulation among the farmers of northern Minnesota, even going to the extent of offering their weekly publication for 10 cents a year. They surely must have an ax to grind in their editorial colums as the above price would not pay the postage.

There is no one living on the upper part of Red Lake River that favors putting in any government dam at Red Lake, as they have had enough of them cussed tools of the lumber companys, who call themselves government engineers. But what the people up this way want is this river to be declared a non-navigable stream, so they can get bridges across it.

Those who did not pay their 1910 realestate taxes, which are now being advertised in the Eleven Towns,is only one part of the taxes and the other part is now being advertised in the Red Lake Falls Gazette and the Plummer Pioneer, which is the part due Red Lake county. We ment ion this so the farmers will not make the mistake of thinking they had paid all their taxes when the settlement is made with Pennington county.

The Progressive Republican League of Pennington County will hold a get-together meeting some time in the latter part of March, at Thief River Falls. We consider this a good idea, as The League can not expect to accomplish much by being divided, on who to suppor for president and for governor. There is likely to be a number of moves made on the political checker board this month and Pennington county had better prepare to get into the game.

Snow often hides crime,and the people living along the banks of the Red Lake River will not fully realize the outrage that was committed by the lumber companys, backed up by that government engineers office at St. Paul, closing up this river until the snow melts this spring. We advise the the formers to at once either bury or burn the dead fish that comes ashore, and not allow them to rot on banks of the river, or take a fork and throw them into the river so enough of them will reach Thief River Falls to convince The Times publishers that there is a lot of dead fish in the river.

Well what did those charges agaist our Congressman, Mr. Steenerson amount to? A lot of political tommyrot, that's all. When the time rools round to elect a congressman the people of this district will elect Halvor Steenerson The farmers of this district, especially, will not forget the stand he made against the reciprocity movement.—Argyle Banner.

He not only made a good fight against reciprocity, but he has a bill now before congress for it's repeal and the farmers of this district knows it, and they will attend to his campaign while he is looking after their interest down in congress,and the politican who tries to defent him for re-election will think he has been hit by the tail end of a Kansas cyclone.

WHAT MAKES SOCIALISTS.

Bemidji elected a Socialist mayer at their city election Feb. 20, who has promised to carry out all the reforms advocated by that party. Again have the people spoke; and they will continue to speak louder and LOUDER, as long as the Republican party continue to keep such damnable old, rotten political hulks in some of their appointative offices. Look at the reports sent in to the Chief engineers, of the war department, from that branch engineers office at St. Paul, that there was no log jam in Red Lake river, when facts have been establish to prove thot they lied. And they stick to it,and their superiors take their word for it, and they sit in their St Paul office, in their silk stockings and dictate these fals reports, while the poor farmers living along this river are melting snow to keep their stock from perishing. Then they allow a man like Major Shunk to continue to occupy that high position, then wonder why so mony of the people ar turning to be Socialists, My god gentelmen can't you see! If you can't see, you will soon feel.

Now let us take a peek at our appointative Game and Fish commission of this state. A gang that is paid by the tax payers of Minnesota. Report was made to them last August that the lumber companys had closed up the outlet to to Red Lake and shut off the watter, which would kill all the fish in Red Lake River. They got busy, at once! Oh yes they got busy, and refered the matter to their deputy game warden at Thief River Falls, (who it was reported was furnished trasportation by the lumber companys),and he made an examination of the river. He of course reported that there was no log jams and that the reports of dead and dying fish on account of log jams was without any foundation whatever. Of course our game man would like to deny this report, which will be published in full later, as there is not now a live fish in Red Lake River, and every farmer living along this river knows that they were slaughterd by allowing that log jam to stay in this river at the outlet of Red Lake, and that the appointative officials of this state and government were nothing but the tools of the lumber companys, to assist them in committing this grestest and darkest crime thot was ever committed in Minnesota.

Then these same men will be kept in office, and next summer they will be sneaking around to try and catch some farmer catch a fish out of season, so as to get a two colum write up in the daily newspapers, and next fall they will wonder why the Socialist are Increasing so fast.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON PETITION FOR FORMATION OF NEW SCHOOL DISTRICT.

WHEREAS, A petition has been filed with the County board of the County of Pennington, State of Minnesota, signed and acknowledged by a majority of the freeholders who reside in the proposed new district herein described, and who are entitled to vote at school meetings in their respective districts, and duly verified by the affidavit of one of the residents of said proposed new district, praying for the organization of a new school district out of of the territory hereinafter described, to wit:

The whole of Sections Fifteen (15) Fourteen (14) Thirteen (13), Twenty-Four (24) Twenty-three (23), Twenty-two (22), and that part of Sections Ton (10) Eleven (11) Twelve (12) tying south of Red Lake River, all in the Township One Hundred Fifty Two [152] N. Range Thirty-nine [39], and the said Board of County Commissioners have appointed a time and place of hearing upon said petition as by law required:

Now Therefore, NOTICE is hereby given that a hearing upon said petition will be had at a meating of said board, commencing upon the 29th, day of March A.D. 1912, at 1 o' clock in the afternoon of said day, at the office of County Auditor in the City of Thief River Falls in said County, at which time and place the said County Board will hear arguments of all persons interested, for or against the proposed organization of said new school district.

Dated Thief River Falls Minn, this 19th, day of February A. D. 1912.

By order of the County Board of Pennington County, Minn.

County Auditor and Ex-Officio Clerk of Board [illegible]

Marked For Slaughter.

There seems to be quite a number of candidrtes, "that are being urged by their friends" to please become a candidate for congressman at large from Minnesota. We note that about all of them, so far mentioned, favord Taft in the passage of that reciprocity-pact, and some of them are even suppoting him for renomination. The farmers will have them ducks lined up proper when they go to the ballot box.

Not Saying Much For Them.

Since Alva Eastman, of the St. Cloud Journal-Press has become a candidate for Congressman at large from Minnesota, he calls Canidian Reciprocity, a "Menace to Northwestern farmers." At the time that "menace" was before congress Mr. Eastman abused the farmers because they opposed it. If he is right now, and we believe he he is, then how much pressure did it take from old Jim Hill, and the steel trust, to get him to take the position he took on reciprocity last summer? However with all his faults we consider him rather the best one of the candidates, that has been mentioned, up to date.

Too Much For Him.

Voltaire could not speak much English. The reason why he refused to study the language is this: It was drilled into him that "plague" was pronounced "plaig," which he thought very pretty and acceptable. But right on top of it he was introduced to "ague," which his teacher said must be called "a-gue." Finding it impossible to reconcile the difference, he went off into a philosophical tantrum and dropped the study.

A Bit of a Brag.

Lawyer—Are you acquainted with any of the men on the jury? Witness—Yes, sir; more than half of them. Lawyer—Are you willing to swear that you know more than half of them? Witness—Say, if it comes to that, I'm willing to swear that I know more than all of them put together.—Milwaukee Journal.

Ye editor visited with Deer Park friends last Sunday.

We have fine winter weather, but what we want is spring weather.

Wm. Cousins has been busy hawling his hay home from the meadows this week.

Walter McAndress has been improving the good weather to get his hay home from the meadows, this week.

Two hundred bushels of White Russion seed oats for sale. Inquire of Wm. Parno.

Singer Bros. have advertised an Auction sale, to be held at their Kratka store on Saturday March 9th. This will be a good opprotunity to buy lots of things you need cheap.

Sever Mattren, of Plummer, who is selling the Dr. Koch remedies, was calling on customers in this locality Tuesday. He says he will devote more of his time to farming and less to selling medicine, this summer.

See Ellingson Bros. now add in this issue and call on them with your Sears Robuck catalog in one hand and the cash in the other hand. Give your local merchants a chance to sell you goods at the same prices that they will cost you if you send to Chicago after them.

March came in like a lion this morning, with a good stiff North West January wind, which had ought to make it due to go out like a lamb. We are all about ready for the lamb part, as we have about had enough of the lion and grizzley bear part for this winter.

O. J. Aspin, of Fosston, gave a moving picture entertainment at the Highlanding school house on Tuesday evening, which was well attended. The show lasted for over two hours, and was well worth the price of admission. If Mr. Aspen shows here again he will be well patronized.

It seems that the selling and buying of farms among neighbors is becoming quite popular in this locality. The latest deal to be made is the sale of the Carl G. Olson farm in the town of Kratka to his neighbour Ole S. Breiland. Mr. Olson will sell his stock and form machinery at public auction next Thursday March 7th.

Ed Rustan, from Deer Park returned home from Thief River Falls yesterday whore he served on the pettie jury at this weeks term of District court. There was not a single jury case to be tried, which shows that our people are useing their surplus cash for improvement of the country, instead of blowing it in, in lawsuits, and it is a credit to them and the county in which they live.

Julious Halverson was around this week looking up stock. The stock along Red Lake river are hardly fit for market owing to the water famine, as they will only drink enough of tho stinking water to sustain life, and what they do drink is likely to kill them, but it can't be helped as the lumber companys have this river and our government engineers at St. Paul under complete control, and the farmers stock can "root hug or die"

Patitions will soon be circulated asking for the removel from office of the men who made false reports to their superiors, regading the true conditions on the Red Lake River last fall. We do not know that it will do any good, but it would be fun to see whether them kind of "hairpins are to be kept in public office. Of course the cities below here will not sign until the typhoid feavor strikes them this summer, than they will sign.

O. L. Clark was at the Warren hospital last week, but the Doctors decided that an operation wasnt necessary, as he is on the way to recovery.

Erie should have a ring built, so the boys that go there to fight could have a good place to have their fun in, without disturbing the dancers.

Vaughn Bros. & Co. have their large store at Highlanding, and the warehouse ajoining it filled to overflowing with general merchandise and hardware, with the kind of goods that their experience as merchants has taught them will be required by the people of this locality.

The settlers living along the Red Lake River will long remember the winter of 1911 and 12, as the one in which the lumber companys closed off their water supply, and we think it would be a very good idea for any of that Major Shunk outfit to ware a red cap, if they visit this locality this year, as some of the settlers with long ranged guns might mistake them for black bears.

"Dr. Miles' Nervine Raised Me From the Grave"—Mrs. Taylor

This is a strong statement to make, but it is exactly what Mrs. Thomas Taylor, of Blum, Texas, said in expressing her opinion of this remedy.

> "Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine raised me from the grave and I have much confidence in it. I can never say enough for your grand medicines. If anyone had offered me $100.00 for the second bottle of Nervine that I used I would have said 'no indeed.'"

Where a King's Clothes Were Kept.

St. Andrew's-by-the-Wardrobe is a conspicuous waymark in Queen Victoria street and derives a grotesque distinguishing title from former proximity to the king's great wardrobe. This was originally the town mansion of Sir John Beauchamp and purchased from his executors by Edward III. for the keepers of the king's apparel "There were kept," says Fuller, "the ancient clothes of our English kings which they wore on great festivals." Shakespeare in his will left to his favorite daughter, Susannah, the Warwickshire doctor's wife, a house near the Wardrobe "wherein one John Robinson dwelleth." The present Church of St. Andrew's-by-the-Wardrobe was rebuilt by Wren after the great fire and became the city center of the evangelical revival under William Romaine.—Westminster Gazette.

SAVED THE NORTHWEST.

Dr. Whitman Kept It From Being Traded to England.

But for the foresight, it is said, of a missionary this country would have "traded off" to Great Britain that immense territory that now forms two of the greatest states of the northwest —Oregon and Washington.

Marcus Whitman had crossed the plains and the mountains to Oregon and knew from a year's residence the value of the country. He also knew that the Hudson Bay company was anxious to obtain possession of the whole northwest and had circulated the report that it was impossible for emigrants to cross the mountains in wagons.

At a dinner given in 1842, at which Dr. Whitman and several of the company's chief officers were present, news was received that a band of British emigrants had crossed the mountains. Toasts were drunk in honor of the event. "Now the Americans may whistle—the country is ours!" one of the Englishmen is reported to have exclaimed jubilantly.

But Whitman thought otherwise. The next day he started for Washington on horseback. He made the journey in winter and with frozen limbs called on Daniel Webster, then secretary of state. Upon his presentation of the situation Whitman was gruffly told by Webster that the country was worthless and that he, as secretary of state, was about to trade that "worthless region" for valuable concessions with reference to the Newfoundland fisheries.

Finding that a treaty had already been approved by the senate and was awaiting formal ratification and proclamation by President Tyler, Dr. Whitman sought the president. When the missionary had finished his story the president said:

"Sir, your frozen limbs attest your sincerity. Can you take emigrants across the mountains in wagons?"

"Give me six months and I will take 1,000 across," answered the doctor.

"If you can take them across," added Tyler, "the treaty shall not be ratified."

In 1843 a band of emigrants under the guidance of the doctor started from Missouri for Oregon. A deputation from the Hudson Bay company met them on the plains, advising them that it was impossible for them to cross the mountains in their wagons. The emigrants decided to leave their wagons and finish the journey on horseback.

As this course would have ruined Whitman's plan of saving the country to the United States, he labored with the leaders of the band until they consented to follow the doctor's advice and guidance. The band did cross the mountains in their wagons, the treaty was not ratified, and the fertile northwest was saved to the United States.—New York Herald.

An Odd Superstition.

A strange superstition is that of an otherwise perfectly normal western man who as a buyer for a very large department store of the country has had marvelous success. His talent seems to lie in reading the hidden thoughts of men and in that way securing bargains few others can ever seem to get. To a few of his intimates, not his trade friends, he gives a weird explanation of this power. Wherever he can he says he drinks water from the same glass as the person with whom he is about to do business, taking care to drink after him. There is not a doubt in his mind that there is truth in the old belief that if two drink water out of one glass the last to drink will know the other's secrets. At all events this man says the test never fails.—New York Sun.

Amulets of the Burman.

Highly prized by the Burman are the following gems: Ruby, diamond or crystal, pearl, coral, topaz, sapphire, catseye, amethyst, and emerald. Collectively they ward off sickness or danger. The catseye is supposed to secure invulnerability in war. Incantations are muttered over some or all of these stones, and the water in which they are immersed is drunk in order to secure immunity from all evil. Spells are uttered over rubies, and they are inserted as amulets in the flesh of men who desire to be immune from wounds inflicted by sword, spear or gun.

One of Tom Hood's.

There was a noted brand of tobacco which the sailors of England chewed in the early years of the nineteenth century—"pigtail." And it is commemorated in one of the most ingenious of Thomas Hood's punning verses, in which he recounts the life, love and sorrow of a sailor, a British sailor:

His head was turned, and so he chewed
His pigtail till he died.

"I said nothing and watched her grow old."

BLOOD MONEY IN PERSIA.

Curious Laws In That Country Governing the Crime of Murder.

A Persian murderer may pay blood money in lieu of his own life. The manner in which this is calculated is one of the most complicated things about Persian law. A woman is worth only half a man, and so a man cannot be executed for the murder of a mere woman. A husband whose wife had been killed by his steward was obliged first to pay half the steward's blood price to the man's relations, and thus the steward, having been reduced to the value of half a man, equal to one whole woman, was legally executed.

From this principle it follows that a man who has killed two women can be condemned to death, as equality is not infringed. If the murder of a woman be committed by several men the friends, upon whose initiative alone any proceedings can take place, can demand the death of but one of the murderers and always by paying the difference in the price of blood. On the same ground if two women murder a man the death of both can be demanded.

Evidently one could make a considerable fortune in Persia by getting one's men folk murdered by a woman apiece. Much the same plan is carried out in the case of minor injuries, with this curious addition—that the part of the body paid for is considered to be the property of the one who pays the blood money.—London Times.

Wagner's Nerve.

Wagner, the eminent composer, had the nerves of an acrobat. Once he was climbing a precipitous mountain in company with a young friend. BURNING DAYLIGHT

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his [illegible] birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling, in which over $100,000 is [illegible]. Harnish loses his money and his [illegible] but wins the mail contract. He starts on his mail trip with dogs and sled, telling his friends that he will be in the big Yukon gold strike at the start. Burning Daylight makes a sensationally rapid run across country with the mail, appears at the Tivoli and is now ready to join his friends in a dash to the new gold fields.

CHAPTER IV—Continued.

In the meantime there was naught to show for it but hunch. But it was coming. As he would stake his last ounce on a good poker hand, so he staked his life and effort on the hunch that the future held in store a big strike on the Upper River. So he and his three companions, with dogs, and sleds, and snowshoes, toiled up the frozen breast of the Stewart, toiled on and on through the white wilderness where the unending stillness was never broken by the voices of men, the stroke of an ax, or the distant crack of a rifle. Gold they found on the bars, but not in paying quantities, and in the following May they returned to Sixty Mile.

Ten days later, Harper and Joe Ladue arrived at Sixty Mile, and Daylight, strong to obey the hunch that had come to him, traded a third interest in his Stewart town site for a third interest in theirs on the Klondike. They had faith in the Upper Country, and Harper left down-stream, with a raft-load of supplies, to start a small post at the mouth of the Klondike.

"Why don't you tackle Indian River, Daylight?" Harper advised, at parting. "There's whole slathers of creeks and draws draining in up there, and somewhere gold just crying to be found. That's my hunch. There's a big strike coming, and Indian River ain't going to be a million miles away."

"And the place is swarming with moose," Joe Ladue added. "Bob Henderson's up there somewhere, been there three years now, swearing something big is going to happen, living off'n straight moose and prospecting around like a crazy man."

Daylight decided to go Indian River a flutter, as he expressed it; and lingered a few days longer arranging his meager outfit. He planned to go in light, carrying a pack of seventy-five pounds and making his five dogs pack as well, Indian fashion, loading them with thirty pounds each. Depending on the report of Ladue, he intended to follow Bob Henderson's example and live practically on straight meat. When Jack Kearns' scow, laden with the sawmill from Lake Linderman, tied up at Sixty Mile, Daylight bundled his outfit and dogs on board, turned his town-site application over to Elijah to be filed, and the same day was landed at the mouth of Indian River. He continued down Hunker to the Klondike, and on to the summer fishing camp of the Indians on the Yukon.

Here for a day he camped with Carmack, a squaw-man, and his Indian brother-in-law, Skookum Jim, bought a boat, and, with his dogs on board, drifted down the Yukon to Forty Mile. Then it was that Carmack, his brother-in-law, Skookum Jim, and Cultus Charlie, another Indian, arrived in a canoe at Forty Mile, went straight to the gold commissioner, and recorded three claims and a discovery claim on Bonanza Creek. After that, in the Sourdough Saloon, that night, they exhibited coarse gold to the skeptical crowd. Daylight, too, was skeptical, and this despite his faith in the Upper Country. Had he not, only a few days before, seen Carmack loafing with his Indians and with never a thought of prospecting? But at eleven that night, sitting on the edge of his bunk and unlacing his moccasins, a thought came to him. He put on his coat and hat and went back to the Sourdough. Carmack was still there, flashing his coarse gold in the eyes of an unbelieving generation. Daylight ranged alongside of him and emptied Carmack's sack into a blower. This he studied for a long time. Then, from his own sack, into another blower, he emptied several ounces of Circle City and Forty Mile gold. Again, for a long time, he studied and compared. Finally, he pocketed his own gold, returned Carmack's, and held up his hand for silence.

"Boys, I want to tell you-all something," he said. "She's sure come—the up-river strike. And I tell you-all, clear and forcible, this is it. There ain't never been gold like that in a blower in this country before. It's new gold. It's got more silver in it. You-all can see it by the color. Carmack's sure made a strike. Who-all's got faith to come along with me?"

No one volunteered.

"Then who-all 'll take a job from me, cash wages in advance, to pole up a thousand pounds of grub?"

Curly Parsons and another, Pat Monahan, accepted, and, with his customary speed, Daylight paid them their wages in advance and arranged the purchase of the supplies, though he emptied his sack in doing so. He was leaving the Sourdough, when he suddenly turned back to the bar from the door.

"Got another hunch?" was the query.

"I sure have," he answered. "Flour's sure going to be worth what a man will pay for it this winter up on the Klondike. Who'll lend me some money?"

On the instant a score of the men who had declined to accompany him on the wild-goose chase were crowding about him with proffered gold-sacks.

"How much flour do you want?" asked the Alaska Commercial Company's storekeeper.

"About two ton."

The proffered gold-sacks were not withdrawn, though their owners were guilty of an outrageous burst of merriment.

"What are you going to do with two tons?" the storekeeper demanded.

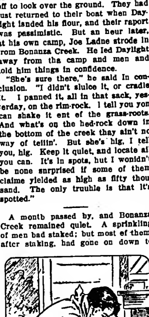
"I'll tell you-all in simple A, B, C and one, two, three." Daylight held up one finger and began checking off. "Hunch number one: a big strike coming in Upper Country. Hunch number two: Carmack's made it. Hunch number three: ain't no hunch at all. It's a cinch. If one and two is right, then flour just has to go sky-high. If I'm riding hunches one and two, I just got to ride this cinch, which is number three. If I'm right, flour 'll balance gold on the scales this winter."

CHAPTER V.

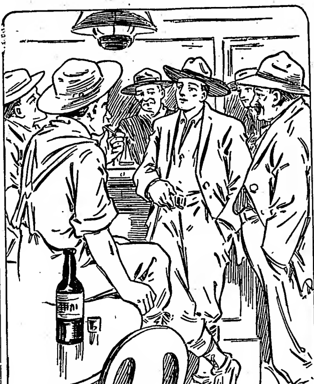
Still men were without faith in the strike. When Daylight, with his heavy outfit of flour, arrived at the mouth of the Klondike, he found the big flat as desolate and tenantless as ever. Down close by the river, Chief Isaac and his Indians were camped beside the frames on which they were drying salmon. Several old-timers were also in camp there. Having finished their summer work on Ten Mile Creek, they had come down the Yukon, bound for Circle City. But at Sixty Mile they had learned of the strike, and stepped off to look over the ground. They had just returned to their boat when Daylight landed his flour, and their report was pessimistic. But an hour later, at his own camp, Joe Ladue strode in from Bonanza Creek. He led Daylight away from the camp and men and told him things in confidence.

"She's sure there," he said in conclusion. "I didn't sluice it, or cradle it. I panned it, all in that sack, yesterday, on the rim-rock. I tell you you can shake it out of the grass-roots. And what's on the bed-rock down in the bottom of the creek they ain't no way of tellin'. But she's big, I tell you, big. Keep it quiet, and locate all you can. It's in spots, but I wouldn't be none surprised if some of them claims yielded as high as fifty thousand. The only trouble is that it's spotted."

A month passed by, and Bonanza Creek remained quiet. A sprinkling of men had staked; but most of them, after staking, had gone on down to Forty Mile and Circle City. The few that possessed sufficient faith to remain were busy building log cabins against the coming of winter. Carmack and his Indian relatives were occupied in building a sluice box and getting a head of water. The work was slow, for they had to saw their lumber by hand from the standing forest. But farther down Bonanza were four men who had drifted in from up river, Dan McGilvary, Dave McKay, Dave Edwards, and Harry Waugh. They were a quiet party, neither asking nor giving confidences, and they herded by themselves. But Daylight, who had panned the spotted rim of Carmack's claim and shaken coarse gold from the grass-roots, and who had panned the rim at a hundred other places up and down the length of the creek and found nothing, was curious to know what lay on bed rock. He had noted the four quiet men sinking a shaft close by the stream, and he had heard their whip-saw going as they made lumber for the sluice boxes. He did not wait for an invitation, but he was present the first day they sluiced. And at the end of five hours' shoveling for one man, he saw them take out thirteen ounces and a half of gold. It was coarse gold, running from pinheads to a twelve-dollar nugget, and it had come from off bed-rock. The first fall snow was flying that day, and the Arctic winter was closing down; but Daylight had no eyes for the bleak-gray sadness of the dying, short-lived summer. He saw his vision coming true, and on the big flat was upreared anew his golden city of the snows. Gold had been found on bed-rock. That was the big thing. Carmack's strike was assured. Daylight staked a claim in his own name adjoining three he had purchased with plug tobacco. This gave him a block two thousand feet long and extending in width from rim-rock to rim-rock.



The Whole Bottom Showed as if Covered With Butter.



"Who-all's Got Faith to Come Along With Me?"

Returning that night to his camp at the mouth of Klondike, he found in it Kama, the Indian chief he had left at Dyea. Kama was traveling by canoe, bringing in the last mail of the year. In his possession was some two hundred dollars in gold-dust, which Daylight immediately borrowed. In return, he arranged to stake a claim for him, which he was to record when he passed through Forty Mile. When Kama departed next morning, he carried a number of letters for Daylight, addressed to all the old-timers down river, in which they were urged to come up immediately and stake. Also Kama carried letters of similar import, given him by the other men on Bonanza.

"It will sure be the gosh-dangdest stampede that ever was," Daylight chuckled, as he tried to vision the excited populations of Forty Mile and Circle City tumbling into poling-boats and racing the hundreds of miles up the Yukon; for he knew that his word would be unquestioningly accepted.

One day in December Daylight filled a pan from bed-rock on his own claim and carried it into his cabin. Here a fire burned and enabled him to keep water unfrozen in a canvas tank. He squatted over the tank and began to wash. Earth and gravel seemed to fill the pan. As he imparted to it a circular movement, the lighter, coarser particles washed out over the edge. At times he combed the surface with his fingers, raking out handfuls of gravel. The contents of the pan diminished. As it drew near to the bottom, for the purpose of fleeting and tentative examination, he gave the pan a sudden sloshing movement, emptying it of water. And the whole bottom showed as if covered with butter. Thus the yellow gold flashed up as the muddy water was filtered away. It was gold—gold-dust, coarse gold, nuggets, large nuggets. He was all alone. He set the pan down for a moment and thought long thoughts. Then he finished the washing, and weighed the result in his scales. At the rate of sixteen dollars to the ounce the pan had contained seven hundred and odd dollars. It was beyond anything that even he had dreamed. His fondest anticipations had gone no farther than twenty or thirty thousand dollars to a claim; but here were claims worth half a million each at the least, even if they were spotted.

He did not go back to work in the shaft that day, nor the next, nor the next. Instead, capped and mittened, a light stampeding outfit, including his rabbit skin robe, strapped on his back, he was out and away on a many-days' tramp over creeks and divides, inspecting the whole neighboring territory. On each creek he was entitled to locate one claim, but he was chary in thus surrendering up his chances. On Hunker Creek only did he stake a claim. Bonanza Creek he found staked from mouth to source, while every little draw and pup and gulch that drained into it was likewise staked. Little faith was had in these side-streams. They had been staked by the hundreds of men who had failed to get in on Bonanza. The most popular of these creeks was Adams. The one least fancied was Eldorado, which flowed into Bonanza, just above Carmack's Discovery claim. Even Daylight disliked the looks of Eldorado; but, still riding his hunch, he bought a half share in one claim on it for half a sack of flour. A month later he paid eight hundred dollars for the adjoining claim. Three months later, enlarging this block of property, he paid forty thousand for a third claim, and, though it was concealed in the future, he was destined, not long after, to pay one hundred and fifty thousand for a fourth claim on the creek that had been the least liked of all the creeks.

In the meantime, and from the day he washed seven hundred dollars from a single pan, and squatted over it and thought a long thought, he never again touched hand to pick and shovel. As he said to Joe Ladue the night of that wonderful washing:

"Joe, I ain't never going to work hard again. Here's where I begin to use my brains. I'm going to farm gold. Gold will grow gold if you-all have the savvee and can get hold of some for seed. When I seen them seven hundred dollars in the bottom of the pan, I knew I had seed at last."

The hero of the Yukon in the younger days before the Carmack strike, Burning Daylight now became the hero of the strike. The story of his hunch and how he rode it was told up and down the land. Certainly he had ridden it far and away beyond the boldest, for no five of the luckiest held the value in claims that he held. And, furthermore, he was still riding the hunch, and with no diminution of daring.

A man is as young as he feels—and a woman, but she doesn't always look it.

Beauty—real beauty—is more than skin deep. No cosmetic in the world can give the wholesome color, the bright eyes, the clear, transparent skin that is the natural result of pure blood, proper diet and hygienic habits of daily life.

It sounds easy and it is easy for a woman to have the beauty which health alone can give. A safe and efficient tonic if the blood is weak, thin or impure (Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are especially recommended), the avoidance of foods which will cause eruptions, and regular bathing of the skin. That is all and it is the only way. Most ladies, and especially young mothers, will be interested in the following statement:

"After my baby was born," says Mrs. Etta Estes, of No. 333 South Lawndale street, Kansas City, Mo., "I did not gain in strength as I should have. I did not have any color and kept losing in flesh until I was almost a skeleton. I had severe headaches and pains in the side, arms and shoulders. I finally gave up the doctor's treatment in order to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They helped me immediately and I became stronger each day, soon got a better color and am now in the best of health. I am convinced that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills will do all that is claimed for them and advise any woman who is suffering as I did to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills at once and not wait another day."

Write to the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Box 176, Schenectady, N. Y., for a free booklet, "Plain Talks to Women." It is an outspoken but perfectly proper little book and should be read by every woman and growing girl. A free sample of the new laxative "Pinklets" will also be sent you. Should you be unable to obtain Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People in your locality they will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, fifty cents per box, six boxes for $2.50.

Saving a Desperate Man.

"Why did you get engaged to Harry? You swore that you would never, never, have anything to do with such a man."

"Yes, dear, I knew I did. But—well, I wouldn't have accepted him if he hadn't made such a perfectly dreadful threat."

"Oh! That old stall about rushing out and committing suicide?"

"No, worse than that."

"But any of those threats are bluffs. I suppose he said he'd kill the next man who called on you, eh?"

"No, no! I've heard that before. Dearie, he threatened that if I did not accept him he'd go and propose to you. And I believe he would have done it, too—he was perfectly desperate!"

Strength in Calmness.

The calm man, having learned how to adapt himself to others; and they, in turn, reverence his spiritual strength, and feel that they can learn of him and rely upon him. The more tranquil a man becomes, the greater is his success, his influence, his power for good. Even the ordinary trader will find his business prosperity increases as he develops a greater self-control and equanimity, for people will always prefer to deal with a man whose demeanor is strongly equable.—James Allen.

Strong Healthy Women

If a woman is strong and healthy in a womanly way, motherhood means to her but little suffering. The trouble lies in the fact that the many women suffer from weakness and disease of the distinctly feminine organism and are unfitted for motherhood. This can be remedied.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription

Cures the weaknesses and disorders of women. It acts directly on the delicate and important organs concerned in motherhood, making them healthy, strong, vigorous, virile and elastic.

"Favorite Prescription" banishes the indispositions of the period of expectancy and makes baby's advent easy and almost painless. It quickens and vitalizes the feminine organs, and insures a healthy and robust baby. Thousands of women have testified to its marvelous merits.

It Makes Weak Women Strong. It Makes Sick Women Well.

Honest druggists do not offer substitutes, and urge them upon you as "just as good." Accept no secret nostrum in place of this non-secret remedy. It contains not a drop of alcohol and not a grain of habit-forming or injurious drugs. Is a pure glyceric extract of healing, native American roots.

Nancy Ann, Matchmaker

* * *

By SUSANNE GLENN

The colt tossed her head impatiently as her driver suddenly drew rein.

"Want a ride, Nan?" called the young fellow to the girl on the cool porch. "You'll have to hurry; she won't stand."

"Nan, Nan," called her mother frantically from the door, "do not ride after that colt. You will all be killed!"

But the girl sprang lightly into the low buggy, not waiting to be assisted, and with a wave of her hand, was disappearing down the shady country road.

"Isn't she a darling?" cried Nan eagerly. "Such lines, such a coat, such color. Isn't this a great deal of style for a poor young country doctor who isn't sure of even his office rent? Do not try to make me believe you have taken her for debt!"

Young Dr. Grey laughed happily.

"No, my dear, I did not take her on a debt—although I did get her for a song. She has been mismanaged. She has a trifling fault that is sometimes designated by the term 'balky.' But it is an ugly word, and I refuse to use it in connection with such a perfect animal."

"But a balky horse—for a doctor! Fred, you might better not have sung."

"Wait and see, Miss Doubtful. She is young. She may get over her fault with good handling. And if she does, there isn't a horse in this town that can come up with her. Want to see her go?"

"Oh, yes!" said Nan, shivering pleasurably.

There was a fine straight stretch of smooth road ahead. The slender bay horse seemed not to touch her feet to earth.

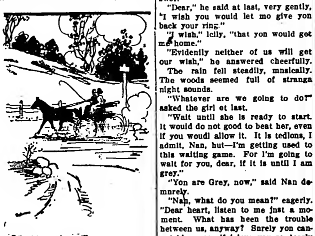
"Isn't that going some?" asked the young man complacently as he drew her to a walk.

"Isn't it worth something to have a horse like that when some one has taken the wrong medicine, or some other accident has occurred?"

"Indeed yes—if she happens to be in good humor."

"At least she has been nothing but pleasant since I have had her. And even if she refuses to go some day, she will be very attractive to look upon while I wait."

Nan laughed derisively. "Still, I do not know that I can blame you," she admitted presently. "I'm in love with her myself. What is her name?"



"Want to see her go!"

"Nancy Ann, to be sure."

"What?" cried Nan so sharply that her namesake flung up her head nervously.

"Of course, I named her for my girl," declared Grey stoutly.

"But you know I hate my name at its best—and Nancy Ann! I will not have it!" she cried stormily. "Every one will make fun."

"I love your name, Nan, dear. And," he added with a smile, "I think it especially appropriate to name her for you. She certainly is as beautiful as the name deserves after your hearing it. And I'm not sure she doesn't exhibit some similarity of character."

Nan sat in displeased silence.

"She has learned her name, too; I certainly cannot change it now, dear."

"You will change it if you care for me," declared the girl.

"That is the very reason why I cannot, Nan. Be reasonable, darling."

Again there was no sound but the light tap of Nancy Ann's hoofs upon the soft road.

When Dr. Grey held out his hand in farewell at her gate, the girl pressed her ring into his palm.

"You surely do not mean this?" he asked gravely.

"Since my desires have no weight with you, I certainly do mean it!" she flashed as she darted into the house.

Fred Grey drove away alone. "Dear little girl," he said as he placed the ring in his pocket. "They are a good deal alike, for a fact."

The weeks that followed were long ones to Nan Thompson.

Dr. Grey drove his new horse daily, attended his few patients, and was studiously polite to Nan when chance threw them together.

"He doesn't care; he doesn't care," she thought over and over. "I shall not care either!"

The few attempts he made to call upon her were unsuccessful.

"Certainly I will ride home with Dr. Grey rather than put you to the trouble of taking me," declared Nan one evening after she had spent the day at her uncle's farm.

Fred Grey with his light-stepping Nancy Ann had very opportunely driven into the yard just as Mr. Thompson started for his own horse.

"It is so fortunate I happened in at the right moment," said the doctor, with a quiet smile.

They rode in silence to the first corner, where the doctor drew up his horse.

"Which road do you prefer, Miss Nan?" he inquired politely.

"Isn't the one over the hill a mile Dr. Grey?"

"That is what they say."

"Then by all means take that one!"

Without a word he turned into the hill road.

Nancy Ann threw her pretty head angrily, and traveled unevenly in nervous spirits. At the foot of the long hill she stopped suddenly.

"Go on, Nancy Ann," said the doctor, gently.

Nancy Ann lowered her head stubbornly. The girl lifted hers in chilling displeasure.

There was absolute silence for five minutes. Darkness was setting in densely. Presently rain began to splash on the leaves above their heads, and the young man sprang out to get the rubber curtains from under the seat.

"Guess you will not need to hold her," he observed.

Nancy Ann stiffened her forelegs defiantly, expecting some unusual move on the part of her driver. But he simply walked around her, adjusting her harness and stroking her neck a little before returning to the buggy.

"Nan," he said after another silence broken only by the fall of the increasing rain, "Nan, I've spent a very lonely summer."

Silence.

"Nan," reaching along the back of the seat, "why do you sit so that the rain beats in against you? Your sleeve is wet."

His arm drew her to a more protected position.

"How much longer, Dr. Grey, do you expect to keep me here?"

"My dear girl, much as I have craved your society, you surely cannot hold me to blame for this delay?"

Nan did not trust herself to answer.

"Dear," he said at last, very gently, "I wish you would let me give you back your ring."

"I wish," icily, "that you would get me home."

"Evidently neither of us will get our wish," he answered cheerfully.

The rain fell steadily, musically. The woods seemed full of strange night sounds.

"Whatever are we going to do?" asked the girl at last.

"Wait until she is ready to start. It would do not good to beat her, even if you would allow it. It is tedious, I admit, Nan, but—I'm getting used to this waiting game. For I'm going to wait for you, dear, if it is until I am grey."

"You are Grey, now," said Nan demurely.

"Nan, what do you mean?" eagerly. "Dear heart, listen to me just a moment. What has been the trouble between us, anyway? Surely you cannot blame me if I love you so dearly that I like your name and everything about you? If you had objected because the name was too good, I would have changed it willingly."

Dropping the useless reins, he drew the ring from his pocket and put it in its old place on her finger.

"Nan," he whispered, "I'm the happiest man that ever sat behind a balky horse."

Nancy pricked up her ears with sudden interest. Then she began to move slowly up the long hill, and at the corner she broke into her usual willing trot.

"Fred, how in the world do you manage with her?" asked the girl.

"I always go by the valley road, even if it is an extra mile. She was brought up and—mismanaged—in the hill road."

"Oh," cried she with sudden understanding, "you do not deserve to be forgiven!"

"But I gave you your choice, my girl. I knew we could come to an understanding if you'd let me see you for half an hour, Nan, dear!"

How a Shoe Day Originated.

When "Big Tim" Sullivan, senator of the state of New York, made his annual distribution of strong shoes and woolen socks to the poor of the Bowery on February 6, he was celebrating the anniversary of an event in his life with which few New Yorkers are familiar. In the days when "Tim" sold papers along Park row he used to make frantic efforts to attend school. He was an earnest pupil, they say, but he had to hustle and was rather an infrequent attendant. One cold, wet morning his teacher arrived to find him in the classroom half an hour ahead of time, and she questioned him. "Tim" explained that he had been out with his papers all morning and that his badly worn shoes were wet. He said he had come into the classroom to warm his feet. The teacher sympathized, gave him a note to a shoe dealer in Canal street, near the Bowery, and "Tim" reported, well shod, later in the day. The date was February 6.

Farm and Road Improvement

PLANNING FOR THE HOT BED

It Will Reduce Grocery Bill Considerably This Spring—Kansas Way Is One Good Suggestion.

Better think about making that hot bed for early radishes and lettuce. It doesn't cost much, and it will lower the grocery bill. Here is the way recommended by the horticultural department of the Kansas State Agricultural college:

Dig a hole two feet deep, a little larger than the size of the hot-bed frame. If the hot-bed is to be permanent, the walls of this pit should be lined with brick, stone or cement. When possible, have a shed or board fence on the north side of the bed. It will take less manure to heat the soil. Put two feet of well-mixed fresh horse manure in the hole, wet thoroughly, and tamp. If the manure is not well tamped, the soil will settle unevenly when the manure decays.

Two-inch material makes a better and stronger frame and will last longer. The front of the frame should be six inches high, the back eighteen inches. Put five inches of dirt on the manure, preferably the richest soil you can get. Fill in around the frame with manure and earth and put the cover on the frame.

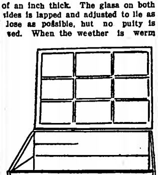
Glass sashes are best for covers. Cloth may be used late in the season. The size of a sash is three by six feet. The bed, then, should be six feet wide and as many times three feet long as desired.

The temperature of the hot-bed will be high at first. Use a thermometer. When the heat has fallen to 85 degrees the seed may be planted. Keep the bed well watered, but do not soak. Too much water rots the manure too rapidly. Be sure the bed is well ventilated. When sashes are used, they must be raised to let in the fresh air in mild weather. Extra covers should be provided for cold days and nights.

GLASS SASH FOR HOT BEDS

Latest Invention Is So Arranged as to Allow Air to Circulate and Ventilate Beds.

The newest invention to make winter gardening easy and successful, is a sash for hotbeds or cold frames that have two layers of glass instead of one. Between these layers is a cushion of dry air about five-eighths of an inch thick. The glass on both sides is lapped and adjusted to lie as close as possible, but no putty is used. When the weather is warm enough to melt snow or ice, the air circulates sufficiently to ventilate the bed; but when it is cold enough to freeze every crevice is sealed by the moisture concealed in the cracks. When very cold weather prevails, the air cushion is absolutely dry and in this condition it is a perfect non-conductor of either heat or cold.



Home-Made Hot Bed.

Even in zero weather the sun, shining through the glass and enclosed air raises the temperature of the bed to a good growing warmth; and at night only a portion of this warmth escapes.

Cabbage, cauliflower, lettuce, beets, violets and pansy plants, it is claimed, are safe under the double glass, at 8 to 10 degrees below zero; and even tomato, pepper and eggplants have been grown in hot beds without any cover except the double glass in a temperature nearly down to zero.

The saving of labor is considerable when the double-glass sash is used. No covering or uncovering is required, no mats or boards are needed. The double sash for hothouses have been found to be a great saving of heat, less coal is required to keep up a given temperature—the plants make a stronger growth and are less liable to leaf drop.

Well-Trained Hired Man.

The hired man on the farm who has mastered his business is a skilled laborer, and should be so treated, yet it is usually impossible for him to get a small amount per month, a mere trifle, over the price paid the inefficient laborer.

Raising Living at Home.

The first thought of the farmer should be this year how to raise his living at home. Begin now to get everything in readiness for an early start.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF AMERICANS GOING TO CANADA

Although Western Canada suffered, as did many other portions of the west, from untoward conditions, which turned one of the most promising crops ever seen in that country, into but little more than an average yield of all grains, there is left in the farmers' hands, a big margin of profit. Of course there were many farmers who were fortunate enough to harvest and market a big yield, and with the prices that were secured made handsome returns. From wheat, oats, barley and flax marketed to the 1st of January, 1912, there was a gross revenue of $75,384,000. The cattle, hogs, poultry and dairy proceeds brought this up to $101,620,000 or 21 million dollars in excess of 1910. There was still in the farmers' hands at that time about 95 million bushels of wheat worth at least another sixty-five million dollars (allowing for inferior grades), besides about 160 million bushels of oats to say nothing of barley and flax, which would run into several million of dollars.

There is a great inrush of settlers to occupy the vacant lands throughout Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The reports from the Government show that during the past year upwards of 131,000 Americans crossed the border into Canada. A great many of these took up farms, over ten thousand having homesteaded, in fact the records show that every state in the Union contributed. A larger number, not caring to go so far away as the homesteading area, have purchased lands at from fifteen dollars an acre to twenty-five dollars an acre. The prospects for a good crop for 1912 are as satisfactory as for many years. The land has had sufficient moisture, and with a reasonably early spring, it is safe to predict a record crop.

Those who have not had the latest literature sent out by the Government agents should send to the one nearest, and secure a copy.

Unpleasant Suggestion.

He—My dear, I really must cut down our expenses.

She—Then if you want to cut them down you have to stop cutting up yourself.

The TAMING of INDIA

by LAURISTON WARD

THE guns which fired a parting salute to King George in Bombay harbor recently, closed a chapter in Indian history. Has the unprecedented visit of the king-emperor been a success? Will the astonishing changes in Indian administration which he announced at the Durbar prove to be, as some think, a masterstroke of statesmanship, or has England made a colossal blunder, which will imperil her position in that Asiatic empire which she has governed so successfully for more than a hundred years?

These are questions which Indians and Englishmen alike are asking. Lord Curzon, Lord Minto and others have announced that they will bring the matter up in the house of lords as soon as parliament meets again. Mr. Asquith has given assurances that it will receive due consideration in the commons. While no one professes to regard the announcements made by the king as anything but final, there seems to be a growing realization of the gravity of the changes, which at the time of their announcement were somewhat overshadowed by the pomp and pageantry of the great Durbar.

Details of the changes are now available, and it appears that the transfer of the capital from Calcutta to Delhi is only part—and not necessarily the most important part—of a far-reaching scheme of provincial readjustment which will affect 82,000,000 human beings and an area as large as that of France or Germany. The province of Bengal, which was partitioned by Lord Curzon in 1905, against the violent protest of its people, and which has been the headquarters of the sedition in India ever since, is to be reunited. The great divisions of Behar, Chota Nagpur and Orissa, which now belong to Bengal, although their populations are distinct in race and language, will be detached from Bengal and form a new province, under the control of a lieutenant governor and council. Assam is to be separately administered by a chief commissioner, as was the case prior to 1905. Lastly, the province of Bengal is to be raised to the rank of a presidency (after the example of Madras and Bombay) with a governor from England appointed by the king.

It is hardly an exaggeration to say that no such sweeping administrative change as this has taken place since the British crown took over the government of the country from the East India company at the close of the mutiny in 1858. As to the motives which prompted the move there is a conflict of opinion. The nationalists regard it as a victory for their cause. They consider that the modification of the partition of Bengal—which the English authorities have repeatedly declared would never be altered—is a confession of weakness on the part of the government, and some of the leaders of the unrest are bold enough to say that the government transferred the capital to Delhi because Calcutta had got too hot to hold it. On the other hand, the dispatches which passed between Simla and London, which have now been made public, contain an array of practical arguments in favor of the change, which successfully disposes of any theory that the government was driven to the measure as the result of seditious agitation. In less troublous times the move would seem justified on plain administrative grounds. As it is, it must be considered as a bold experiment, which is admirable in theory, but which in practice can only be justified by success.

Curiously enough, its first effect has been precisely the opposite of what was expected. It was thought that the Mohammedans would hail with joy the establishment of the central government in the ancient capital of the Moghul emperors. On the contrary, they have been the first to denounce the arrangement, declaring with true Indian perversity that sentimental considerations mean nothing to them in comparison with the loss of their political power in the abolition of the province of Eastern Bengal. It is not the Mohammedans, but their ancestral foes, the Rajputs, who welcome the establishment of the capital within easy reach of their territory. The Bengalis, too, who were expected to resent the loss of prestige to Calcutta involved in the transfer, have declared that they are more than compensated by the wished-for union of the Bengali people. The Hindus in Eastern Bengal have been lighting bonfires for a month past in celebration of the event. So far as can be ascertained the inhabitants of the newly created province of Behar and Orissa are pleased at their release from Bengal domination. Bombay, the Punjab and the United Provinces are sensible of the advantages that will accrue to them for geographical reasons. The rest of India is indifferent.

Delhi is regarded by the government as a better place for a capital than Calcutta, because of its historic traditions, central location, and better climate, which will enable the viceroy and his staff to reside there for all but four months of the year. On the other hand, it is more removed from the commercial interests and active life of modern India. Europeans in Calcutta have not hesitated in declaring that it will be little better than a "Simla of the Plains." The rearrangement of the provinces will make for greater administrative efficiency, though that again is criticized on the ground that the modification of the partition of Bengal is a useless concession to an agitation that was already practically dead, while it will undo all the good work which has been started in the backward districts of Eastern Bengal. The government denies this.

The announcement of the great changes has had at least one effect that is already apparent; it has immensely impressed Hindus and Mohammedans alike with the power of the emperor. Although King George stated at the Durbar that he was acting on the advice of his ministers, this seems to have been ignored by the mass of his subjects, who felt that here was a ruler indeed, whose lightest whim was law, and who could change at a word the foundations of government and the established order of generations. I suppose that few official announcements have ever been more dramatic. Perhaps a dozen men out of India's 300,000,000 were in the secret, and to the rest the declaration came with the surprising force of a revelation.

It is precisely for this reason that anxiety is felt over the ultimate reception of the proposals by the Indian people. When the awe caused by the visible presence of the sovereign has passed away, it is feared that fierce opposition may break out in many quarters. The original partition of Bengal was thought at the time to be an innocent measure, but it stirred up disloyalty in half of India, turned two provinces into hotbeds of sedition and provoked a series of anarchistic crimes which has not yet come to an end. The present changes claim to be purely administrative, but the peculiarly secret and arbitrary way in which they were determined may prove an excuse for new discontent. More than one English official who was at the Durbar expressed the opinion that the next year or two would see another wave of anarchy and sedition incomparably greater than anything India has yet known. The government does not hold this view. It remains to be seen who is right.

Two important facts, in any case, have been made clear by the publication of the dispatches. The first is that India is at last being governed once more from India and not from London, as was the case when Lord Minto was viceroy and Lord Morley secretary of state. The entire scheme for the change of capital and redistribution of provinces originated at Simla, and was embodied in a dispatch from the central government to Lord Crewe, who accepted the proposal without a change. It would be interesting to know whether Lord Hardinge or his council are principally responsible for the undertaking. If the former proves to be the case, current views of the new viceroy will have to be revised. It argues more than a little courage and initiative in a man who has been in India barely a year to risk his official reputation on such a hazardous measure.

The other fact disclosed by the dispatches is an important intimation of England's policy regarding the future government of India. Lord Hardinge and his associates state in so many words that the only solution of the Indian situation lies in the practical autonomy of the provincial governments. In other words, the old bureaucratic regime, which began with the first victories of Clive and the taking over of the Bengal diwani by Warren Hastings is confessed at least to be a failure. Decentralization is to be the watchword from this time onward. A new India is gradually to be formed, on the model of Canada. It will consist of a group of confederated states, financially independent and legislating for themselves in local matters, but subject to the control of the central government in imperial affairs. In name there will probably be little change, for the government of India is slow to move and conservative, yet this is, baldly stated, the signification of the plan. At the same time a further extension of the principle of self-government is indicated. To judge from the words of the dispatch, the central authorities are at last alive to the fact that the government of India must not only be for the Indians, but to a large extent by them, if it hopes to endure. Lord Hardinge's words foreshadow a speedy enlargement of the elective element in the legislative councils and are the most important pronouncement in this respect that has been heard since Lord Morley made public his declaration to grant his famous reforms.

The general effect of the king's visit seems to have been strengthening the loyalty of the Indian people to a degree that surpassed expectations. The wonderful spectacle of the Durbar made a profound impression, and when the king and queen later stood on the wall of the fort in Delhi and received the homage of an adoring crowd of more than 100,000 natives, it is said that the scene was indescribable. Gray-bearded men bowed themselves to the ground and others wept for joy and mothers held up their babies above their heads to see and be blessed by the emperor. An incident that happened at the laying of the first stones of the new capital gained the king a great reputation among the people. As he was about to touch one of the stones with his golden trowel he noticed that it was not quite straight, and asked the master mason to bring it into better alignment. The ceremony was stopped for a few minutes while this was done. The story spread like wildfire through the bazars, and was accepted as an omen by the natives, who now firmly credit their emperor with almost supernatural powers of discernment and a determination to establish the foundations of his city so surely that it will last through all the ages to come.

No seditious attempts were made on the life of the king, although the murder of a police inspector in Eastern Bengal the night before the Durbar gave eloquent testimony to the fact that disloyalty still exists in some sections of the population. The release or remission of sentence of over 180 political prisoners was a move of the king's, which added to his popularity, while his concessions to the native army and the grant of money for the extension of education were deeply appreciated. It is safe to say that if the new reforms are followed by a further extension of representative government King George will be regarded by the mass of his Indian subjects as one of the best beloved emperors that India has ever known.

Hindu and Mohammedan sentiment have for ages marked out Delhi as the real native capital, for has not Delhi, no doubt, mainly from its geographical position, become the capital of every invading and conquering dynasty as it swept over Hindustan from the northwest from time immortal? To prove this the traveler has only to wander along the sandy banks of the river Juma, and also to realize the mortality of empires, for one can clearly see, as in Rome, cities built upon the ruins of cities, and in addition the relics of many a Hindu capital of bygone ages.

The Delhi of today is of course the mighty city of Shah Jehan, with its seven gates and as many arches. The Delhi of the future will be built on the site of the recent Durbar camp. This is situated some miles from the site of the old Mogul capital, as the famous mutiny ridge camp separated the latter from the former camp. It will have the advantage of being built on fresh ground, a by no means trifling detail in India, where sanitation is of paramount importance.

From the point of view of climate, also, there is no doubt that Delhi possesses great advantages over Calcutta. To the newcomer in India Calcutta is described as having one hot month and eleven—hot months, whereas the cold weather of Delhi is delightful.

Another important feature of the proposed change is that the position of Delhi will remove the headquarters of the government from the environment of what is known in India as the Bengali element. This type of supereducated Indian native has undoubtedly been responsible in no small measure for the agitation caused by the partition of Bengal. This innovation was initiated by Lord Curzon and though the agitation against it was never really popular or in any sense national, yet this noisy Bengali element succeeded in raising a clamor quite out of all proportion to their actual numbers, aided as they were by the vernacular press. The further partition of Bengal, recently announced, may have the advantage of further decentralization of the unwieldy machine of teeming millions already divided by Curzon's action.

Another great advantage in the change of the capital is the fact that Delhi is undoubtedly much more in the center of the fighting races than Calcutta. The great native princes much more easily can assemble there. The Sikh and the Rajput princes are nearby—the Maharajah of Kashmir, the Gaekwar of Baroda, the important Nizam of Hyderabad, and the head of that well governed state of Mysore, are mostly at no great distance away, and these all undoubtedly will welcome the change of capital.

BODY IS BAROMETER

Speculations Regarding Effects of Surroundings Upon Man.

German Professor's Paper, Entitled "The Geopsychic Phenomena," Has Made Great Stir in European Scientific Circles.

Berlin.—Prof. W. Hellpach, of Karlsruhe, has published the results of the first all-round inquiry ever made into the problem: "How far are the brain and temperament of man dependent upon natural surroundings?"

His report, entitled "The Geopsychic Phenomena," has made a great stir in scientific circles, owing to the bold theses of the professor, who depicts humanity as a mere vitalized barometer, which reacts incessantly to the stimulus of external forces, but has little independent control over its own movements.

Landscape, says Hellpach, is of infinitely greater importance than climate in forming national character. The idea that climate is more important is a delusion. "In the United States the fantastic mountain world of the great west will in time create a different and much more imaginative race than that which exists in the level east and south. At present America's population is too much in a state of flux to allow of this difference being determined, but the change is going on." America will thus in the future have two populations of entirely different psychical inclinations and characteristics.

Professor Hellpach gives a whole series of facts to show man in his capacity as barometer. His activities depend upon weather fluctuations.

Prof. W. Hellpach.

There live peculiarly sensitive "Wettermenschen" (weather men), whose whole nervous system is affected by thunderstorms. On these tea, coffee and tobacco, taken during a thunderstorm, act with extraordinary force, and the most moderate dose of alcohol, which in clear weather would have no effect, produces violent agitation, and even temporary paralysis.

A second type of weather men is the "snow man," well known to nerve specialists. Shortly before a snowfall their eating, feeding and sleeping are entirely deranged; and they are thus able to predict a snowfall more surely than can a meteorologist with all his instruments. "Snow men" are rarer than "thunder-storm men." Both quickly recover from the weather effects, and even feel better than they did before.

In addition to weather, man reacts to an enormous number of external stimuli, some of which are far off, intangible and even concealed from the senses. Light has precisely the same attractive effect on men as it has on insects. The word "moonstruck" is not a figure of speech, but a reality. Moonlight has a marked effect upon sleepers, and is the main cause of somnambulism. The changes of the moon produce precise organic effects upon certain lower animals, and man is also liable to be moonstruck.

Water, though at a distance and invisible, affects the nervous system and makes some men conscious of its effects. Hence the "divining-rod" is a reality. The underground water really does cause nervous twitchings of the water-seeker's hands, and this sets the rod oscillating. In the same way diviners of hidden coal, ore and other mineral treasures are quite honest. "It is established that there exist sensitive men, whose psychical condition is affected by the composition of the soil underneath, though of this composition they have no knowledge." And even astrology has a basis of truth. The changes of the earth in its relation to the constellations involve changes of gravitation "which causes nervous disturbances and thus operate on the brain." In a scientific sense no man is therefore independent of the stars and planets.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Deserter's Story Preserved in Stone

SCRANTON, PA.—After lying buried in the roots of a tree far more than a century, it is thought, a stone tablet bearing the confession of a revolutionary soldier's infamy has been found by William Sherer of this city. Sherer is a cripple, and, while wandering through the woods, near Rattlesnake Pond, in Spring Brook township, he accidentally brushed away the dirt from a piece of flagstone that caught his attention.

When the coating was removed the following inscription was exposed to Sherer's astonished eyes: "My name is John Neir. Born in 1747. I ran away from the battle of Brandywine in 1777."

With Sherer when he made this interesting discovery were John Hartman and Harry and Louise Pilger. They viewed the find with bulging eyes and finally aided Sherer in a closer inspection. When the tablet was tilted on one side the excited group discovered a small pocket in the other side. Pebbles were packed tightly into the slit, and when they were removed an instrument resembling a nail was revealed. It was about three and a half inches long and it had evidently been used to chronicle the history of John Neir's shame. The stone is of strange oblong shape, about ten inches at its greatest length and seven inches across. Its thickness is about three inches.

Among the hundreds of persons who have viewed the tablet in a central city display window, there is no doubt that the inscription is genuine. The letters are the same color as the stone, a light brown, and there is a suggestion of freshness. It is generally believed that the carving was done soon after the historic incident mentioned in the inscription. It is a peculiar coincidence that Sherer made his discovery almost on the anniversary of the battle of Brandywine. The battle was fought Sept. 11, 1777, 134 years ago.

Keeps Ants in Bottle for Ten Years

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—Away up in the tower of St. Ignatius' college, where is situate the observatory and the sanctorum of Father Odenbach, astronomer, are several hundred ants that have lived ten years in a bottle corked with an aluminum stopper, without any food save small pieces of sound quarter-sawed wood moistened with water.

This somewhat unpalatable ration is served to the ants by Father Odenbach about once a month. And although commonly known as "white ants," the most destructive to wood, particularly to oak, of any known insects, they are really not ants at all, but termites and members of the "darning needle" family.

The bottle is nearly covered on the inside by a slimy, cement-like excrement given out by the insects in moving about. The bottle has been changed once during the ten years, and then because that which they first occupied was accidentally broken by the savant.

The particular "ants" Father Odenbach has came from Florida. Many have died, but others have been born, the number remaining about the same. The bodies of those who die are eaten by the survivors and it is not infrequent for some of the insects to kill one another by the cannibalistic method.

Several instances where a species of the termites, differing but little from those in the bottle, has nearly caused great havoc and loss of life in Cleveland buildings, were given by Professor Odenbach. In one dry goods store he found the oak uprights supporting an entire department, under which a number of girls were working, almost eaten through by the omnivorous insects.

Wealthy Thief Erratic Since His Duel

HE STOLE A LOAF OF MY BREAD!!

NEW YORK.—Matthew W. Harbeson, son of the millionaire founder of the brick trust and great-grandson of Robert Morris, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, who was sent to jail for thirty days for stealing a loaf of bread, has been "erratic" ever since he fought a duel many years ago, his mother declared.

Recorder Medins, in Woodcliffe, N. J., sentenced Harbeson on complaint of a grocer who saw him take a loaf from his bread box.

Harbeson, who married a maid in his mother's household, has five children and lives in one of the show places in Woodcliffe, which his mother bought for him.

"Matthew has not been well since he was wounded in a duel at Kiel university, where he studied many years," said Mrs. Harbeson. "It was the custom then to fight with schlagers. He was the best swordsman in the university, and, to use a slang expression, was the 'goat' whenever his college had been offered an insult by another university.

"The most serious duel, the one in which he received so vicious a cut that the removal of a part of his skull was necessitated, arose when a German student insisted the Rhine was wider than the Hudson river. There were hot words and a challenge resulted.

"There was no reason for my son's act other than his ill health, which has made him a trifle erratic. I have given him a good monthly income, besides paying all his running expenses and the interest on his property. I think his eccentricities are due to the many wounds he received in his duels. He fought thirty-seven in all.

"I shall go to him at once and see what can be done. I deplore this notoriety. It hurts me terribly."

These Dancers Must Don Diving Suits

WELL OF ALL TH'—

LOS ANGELES.—Society women of Los Angeles, San Francisco and Pasadena are planning a fete on the bottom of the ocean off Catalina Island early this spring. It is such a party that even Rome in its greatest days never saw the equal.

Walter Ho[illegible]son Pritchard, marine artist, is arranging details, and, according to him, guests are to be attired in diving suits, each with an oxygen tank or air tubes.

Catalina Island has been chosen for the affair because of the extraordinary clearness of the water and remarkable marine gardens at the bottom of the sea.

The bottom of the ocean will be illuminated by electric bulbs, and by a unique arrangement music from a band on a yacht anchored overhead will be conveyed through the water, acting as a sounding board.

The "turkey trot" and three entirely new dances, the "mermaid dip," the "lobster claw" and the "finny wiggle," will be danced by the guests to the strains of the band.

If possible a real mermaid will be secured to take part in the "dip." There will be no trouble getting lobsters for the "claw" dance, it is said.

"Reggie" Van Toole, popular as a cotillon leader, has composed a catchy waltz named "My Submarine Sue," which will be played for the first time in marine public.

A light repast will be served on sea shells, the food being made water proof by incasing it in a thin coating of gelatine. Rubber pipes run from the yacht above will convey liquid refreshment to the guests.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

MADERO'S DIFFICULT TASK

Madero is said to be worth $20,000,000.

Recent revolutionary outbreak in the Republic of Mexico, has again brought into the limelight Francisco Madero, and there is some speculation in certain quarters regarding the president's ability to handle the situation. Madero is the strangest world-figure alive today. He is a brave but not a brilliant soldier. He is a quiet, modest gentleman and scholar, too nearly a dreamer and a doctrinaire in patriotism for the thought of despotic rule or undeserved injury to any man ever to enter his mind. Gold lace and medals for himself he despises almost as heartily as he does graft and selfish greed. There is not a trace of the glitter that the Latin-American temperament loves about the man now so well beloved, whose pen picture we quote from Hampton's Magazine:

The Madero properties in Mexico are larger than several small American states combined, and the elder Madero is said to be worth $20,000,000.

Francisco Madero is about forty-two years old, is married and the father of a numerous family.

COLONY TO AID CITY'S POOR

Two thousand acres near Kutmen, Ind., will be devoted to the Warren Springer colonization scheme for poor Chicago families with many children, according to the statement of Mrs. Margaret Springer, widow of the millionaire real estate man.

The colony will be laid out as Oscar Lovell Triggs, formerly of the University of Chicago and now a member of Katherine Tingley's Theosophist colony at Point Loma, Cal., devised with Mr. Springer years ago.

"In the city a family of ten children are liabilities, in the country they are assets," said Mrs. Springer, leaning back in her chair with Russian furs draped over her left shoulder. "'Daddy' Springer's idea was to boost the poor who lead such miserable lives in the congested parts of the city, not to lay down the law to them as to how they must act.

"I mentioned Oscar Lovell Triggs because it was his idea in the first place as far back as 1898. To say the colony will be like Mrs. Tingley's center at Point Loma is a mistake. There will be no religious element, and in fact no element but the economic.

DIRECTOR OF RURAL SCHOOLS

A new division of experts in educational work will be organized shortly by the United States Bureau of Education to look after the needs of the rural schools of the country. This is the latest plan of Uncle Sam for the proper education of the coming generation in rural communities. In addition to the 10 or more specialists in rural education, there will be a number of experts engaged to assist in the handling of problems relative to city schools. These will include specialists for trade schools, agricultural education below the college, education in home-making, commercial education and for normal schools and the training of teachers. In the division there will also be specialists in city school administration, in school sanitation and hygiene, and one or two in secondary education, with a director of research.

The plan will include a personal visit of representatives of the bureau to every rural school in the United States. The main object is to improve the surroundings of the pupils and to aid in securing proper school houses. Dr. A. C. Monahan is to have direct charge of the new rural school work. "Our first step," he says, "will be to make a survey of the field so that we may know definitely conditions of the rural schools as they now exist.

"We have in the United States right now about 506,000 public school teachers, while about 125,000 new teachers are required every year.

HEAD OF A BIG POSTOFFICE

Simply because Mrs. Gustava A. Root—no relation to the senior senator from New York—postmaster of the mining town of Tuttle, Col., recently took it upon herself to order a couple of men from her office at the point of a six-shooter one must not infer that she is the only woman postmaster (not postmistress) in the country. Tuttle is a fourth-class office.

There are 53 women postmasters at first and second class offices, and nearly 200 of all classes, many of them of long terms, extending over two or more administrations.

The highest paid woman postmaster is Miss Alice M. Robertson at Muskogee, Okla. Miss Robertson has had a rather notable career and is known to every postmaster who has attended any of the conventions of presidential postmasters during the past few years. Miss Robertson is a native of Oklahoma and is now in her fifty-seventh year. Her parents were missionaries among the Indians of Indian territory, and she was born at one of these missions. Miss Robertson has seen practically nothing but Indians ever since.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

What Society Wears at the Capital

WASHINGTON.—The first of the season's evening receptions by the President and Mrs. Taft brought to the White House a company that surpassed in the manner of appointment and attire anything ever before seen in Washington, even at a diplomatic reception.

As usual on this occasion the jewels and gowns of the feminine visitors were in keeping with the court uniforms and decorations of the envoys. Mme. Bakhmeteff's sapphires and diamonds, the Countess von Bernstorff's diamond tiara and necklace, with Mrs. Franklin MacVeagh's ropes of pearls, are never seen to such splendid advantage as when in contrast with the gold embroidered and beribboned gentlemen of the corps diplomatique. The plainest person at the White House function is usually the president himself. Mrs. Taft is maintaining her reputation as the best dressed mistress the White House has known since the days of Dolly Madison.

There were white dresses, and black dresses, of course, several of them handsome enough to grace a presidential dinner party, but the handsomest gowns, using the superlative degree with all deference, were in the vivid colorings which are distinctively of 1912.

Two or more schools of dress are distinctly established in Washington smart circles. The rich and rare brocades, velvets and satins made in rather severe lines, with untrimmed skirts and much adorned corsage, which bear the hallmark of the Worth, are leaders in one line, while equally well favored are the diaphanous chiffons, the tulles, nets and metallic gauze with contrasting under drapery, or over drapery of soft pliable satin and the new taffeta.

Rhinoceros Tail Is Latest Gift to Bride

NOW THAT IS WHAT I CALL A FINE PRESENT

THE tail of a rhinoceros for a wedding present! That was the extraordinary gift received by Miss Mary Carlisle, leader of the younger social set, from Col. Theodore Roosevelt, mighty hunter of Oyster Bay.

The arrival at the Carlisle home on I street of a strange looking package from the Roosevelt village was not told until the other day, although the gift was received several weeks ago, at the time of the wedding of Miss Carlisle to Walter Howe, a young lawyer of this city. Miss Carlisle opened the package herself, feeling that the greatest prize of her record-breaking collection of wedding gifts was about to be revealed.

A little scream of fright drew the members of the family and servants as a black, peculiar object resembling a snake rolled out on the floor.

"What on earth can it be?" the household asked.

"It must have crept into the package in the express office!" suggested some one.

Then gradually the truth dawned. It was no mistake. It was the gift of the great hunter—the "brush of the rhino"—the prize won in the greatest of jungle battles.

The wedding of Miss Carlisle and Walter Howe in St. John's church was one of the big social events of the winter, and they are now on a honeymoon in Europe—an extensive tour, but one that will not take in Africa. The bride, so her friends say, is spending much deep thought in an effort to compose a note of thanks to the colonel.

The rhinoceros tail was unadorned; it was simply dry and black, much as if it had been ripped off by the mighty Bwana Tumbo and hung up to dry. Mrs. Howe is the daughter of Mrs. Calderon Carlisle.

Uncle Sam's Bare-Legged Soldiers

UNCLE SAM has in his army some thousands of little brown men of the mid-Pacific, who approximate all grades of civilization and a lack of it and who are well typified by the accompanying illustration, which shows the Philippine soldier in the course of being transformed. A year before this picture was taken these men were wild in the woods, with nothing but a breechclout in the way of clothing. They have advanced to a stage where they take great pride in their caps and coats, but still refuse to adopt the trousers and shoes. A year later, however, they will be found as fully equipped as is their captain, shown in the foreground.

The Philippine constabulary, of which these men are a part, is now a little more than 5,000 strong, including officers and men. To be exact there were 4,130 men and 296 officers at last report. This constabulary had its origin in the Filipino scouts that were organized during the war of occupation. The scouts readily adopted the methods of the Americans and showed themselves easily amenable to discipline. With them as a basis, the force has been gradually increased until members of the constabulary are to be found in nearly all parts of the island, and have come to be as much depended upon to keep order as are the American troops.

The Filipino have are taken when they know nothing of the English language and little of civilized life. They are provided with shelter and food and get small wages. There is a scramble to get into the service. By nature these Malay Mongolian races are great imitators. When they see a thing done once they can come near repeating it.

The Filipino is being found to be an excellent fighter. There have been instances when led by an American officer these troops have charged fortified positions with a resulting death percentage as high as 40 and have refused to give up the charge.

How a Congressman Became an Indian

IN the office of Representative Steenerson of Minnesota hangs a pipe of peace and hatchet—once buried—that are mementoes of the time Steenerson was adopted by the Chippewa Indians.

Steenerson was a grown man at the time of the adoption. He had never become a regular Indian. He had done several favors for the Chippewas and they made him a member of the tribe, just as a college might bestow an LL. D. When it came to the actual conferring of the tribal title there were war dances, smoking of the pipe of peace, burying the hatchet, and much more merry doings that made Steenerson think what a fine thing it would be if the Elks and the Knights Templars could arrange to hold a joint grand lodge meeting. Jolly as it all was, the Indians were as solemn as if they had just spent several months previous standing in front of cigar stores.

Toward the close of the exercises the chief walked toward Steenerson and proceeded to invest him with a wampum belt, or surcingle, that would make him a full member of the tribe, with voting privilege and no dues.

But Steenerson, who stands six feet four, has a girth like a yearling Percheron, or a traffic cop, and the Indian's belt lacked about five inches of meeting.

The chief muttered something that made all the Indians smile, though they were not due to smile until toward the end of the following month. Even in his more giddy moments the average Chippewa is about as jocose as the portraits of George Washington. Steenerson learned that the chief's facetious remark was:

"When him been Indian little while him be small enough there for belt to meet all right."

AVIATION NONSENSE.

Why should any aviator at this stage talk flying across the Atlantic in 30 or any number of hours? If he feels impelled to try a 3,000-mile flight in a dirigible or an aeroplane, why does he not turn westward, where there is plenty of solid earth to land on? There may be men somewhat foolhardy enough to attempt the flight from Newfoundland to Ireland. It is a sure and easy way of achieving passing notoriety and incidentally of committing suicide by drowning, says the New York World. There will be time enough to talk of crossing the ocean in an aeroplane when this continent has been traversed by air without alighting Back of this nonsense about flying across the Atlantic is the misfortune that the business of aviation has fallen so largely into the hands of showmen. They are interested chiefly in doing "stunts" for the sake of the advertising and future gate receipts. It is becoming a question whether practical advances will be made in the science of aviation in this country except the government take it up seriously for military purposes, as has been done in France.

The suggestion of Prof. George D. Baker, of Harvard, head of the Drama League, of Boston, that American audiences should indicate their disapproval of plays and players by hissing, is received by producers with disapproval, naturally, and is not likely to win much favor with the playgoer. The qualifications of the one who hisses must be examined before we will grant him the privilege, and not even a certificate from the Drama League that such and such persons are equipped with critical judgment and are able to reach safe and sound opinions will be sufficient warrant for a commission to hiss. It is imaginable that the tired business man might find most earnest and sincere objection to a play which was giving the Drama League keen intellectual enjoyment, says the Chicago Tribune. It might be dangerous to commission them to hiss, and if the Drama League hissed a play which the tired business man was enjoying, it probably would find itself on its head outside the main door. The hiss will not help the drama uplift. Empty seats are the best protests against undesirable, bad or banal plays.

If the army gets more aeroplanes it will have to call them airplanes. At least the appropriation bill reported by the house committee on military affairs calls the things airplanes, and airplanes, therefore, are the only things that can pull money away from the public treasury—unless congress alters the wording of the bill. It appears that a sensitive representative from Texas objects to the word "aeroplane," and will not be satisfied with anything less than "airplane," which he says means the same thing. In the interests of the simple life, by all means call the things airplanes.

France is soon to have the first aerial regiment ever organized. Not all the members can, for the present, take the air at once, but an appropriation is to be asked for buying enough aeroplanes to bring the total up to 1,000, of four different sorts. The yearly cost of keeping this service efficient is estimated at $4,000,000; the cost in lives is not so easy to reckon.

That St. Petersburg is rapidly growing in population is evidenced by the census taken in December, 1910, which showed the population, including certain suburban villages formerly not covered, to be 1,907,708. It is preeminently an "office town" and also a seaport for six or eight months of the year. The principal industry is the manufacture of cotton textiles, although its advantage as a port of entry for the interior is gaining recognition A line of steamers has been established to Libau, connecting there with a trans-Atlantic line to New York. This enables American shippers to send goods direct to this port without the delays of trans-shipment in foreign ports

A Kansas professor thinks that courses on child-rearing should be introduced into our colleges. He is quite right in his criticism that, while we pay a great deal of attention to the breeding of live stock, we give practically none to the more important matter of breeding children.

STEEL TRUST HIT

ACCOUNTANT SAYS CORPORATION OPERATES IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

GARY DINNERS FIX PRICES

Report Shows Morgan & Co. Received Cash Profit of $69,300,000 for Organizing Concern Which Controls 80 Per Cent. of Industry.

Washington. — The United States Steel corporation operates in restraint of trade and J. Pierpont Morgan received $70,000,000 for organizing the trust, according to F. J. McRae, expert accountant, who made a report on the inquiry into the books and minutes of the trust. His report reaches the conclusion that the corporation prevents competition through a manipulation of prices, through the influence of the so-called "Gary dinners," by control of raw materials and through a system of interlocking directors in various companies.

Some of the charges made in the report are:

That J. P. Morgan & Co., heading the syndicate which organized the Steel corporation, received a cash profit of $69,300,000, of which $62,500,000 was for promotion, and $6,800,000 for a bond conversion scheme.

That the net earnings for nine years were $1,029,685,380, or an equivalent of approximately $13 a ton on finished product, instead of $980,000,811 as claimed by the corporation in its report.

That the statement made by Judge Gary and H. C. Frick to President Roosevelt in 1907 that the Steel corporation did not control more than 60 per cent. of steel properties in the country was wrong; that it controls on the contrary about 80 per cent. of the steel holdings.

The "Gary dinners," where independent as well as corporation steel men assembled, and where "the so-called independents are influenced to reduce their production conformably to their estimate of the reduction in the demand existing, and to maintain prices, is objectionable as far as it operates to exclude free competition.

"It can be no justification of the co-operation of the participants in the Gary dinners that no penalty attaches to a violation of the declarations mutually exchanged. The anti-trust act would prevent the enforcement of any penalty for reducing prices or exceeding one's share of the business.

TO TESTIFY AGAINST DARROW

Former Aid of Attorney Confesses to Bribery and Will Turn State's Evidence.

Los Angeles, Cal.—District Attorney John D. Fredericks made the positive announcement that Bert H. Franklin, former McNamara detective, will be the state's star witness against Attorney Clarence S. Darrow, who is charged with bribery.

This announcement followed the entering of a plea of guilty by Franklin to a charge of corruption and bribery in the Robert Bain case. Fredericks further stated that a complete confession has been secured from Franklin, who will take the stand at the trial of Mr. Darrow and tell fully of his part in the alleged attempt to bribe jurors in the McNamara case.

For his complete confession, and in light of the fact that the George M. Lockwood bribery charge still hangs over his head, Franklin will be permitted to pay a fine of $2,000.

Confesses Murder; Arrested.

New Haven, Conn.—George Redding, twenty-one years old, of this city, an agent for a correspondence school, is under arrest here on his confession that he killed Morris Greenburg, a fruit dealer, whose body was found in a suburb three days ago.

$5,000,000 Brewary Burns.

Valdivia, Chile.—The brewery belonging to Anwandter Bros., the largest in South America, was destroyed by fire here. The loss is estimated at five million dollars.

INTERSTATE BODY HIT

COMMERCE COURT ANNULS ITS ORDER, POWER IS REDUCED.

Decision Holds Reduction of Freight Rates in South Unlawful—Big Loss to Railroads.

Washington.—Bitterness was added to the controversy between the interstate commerce commission and the commerce court as a result of the court's annulment in a decision handed down by Judge Archbold of the commission's order for a reduction of certain class freight rates from New Orleans to points in Alabama and Florida.

The court declares congress never intended to clothe the commission with the wide authority it has assumed.

It is further asserted that the court could discover nothing in the record in support of the conclusions of the commission or to justify the reductions in rates that it ordered.

This was the first case argued before the commerce court after its establishment, more than a year ago it proved to be a stubborn proceeding, and the court took full time for its consideration.

It was brought by the Louisville & Nashville railroad in an effort to modify or annul the commission's order of reduction.

It was declared in the record that if the order of the commission fixing what, in its opinion, were reasonable rates, were enforced, the loss to the Louisville & Nashville would be $200,000 a year.

SAYS PLEDGE WAS BROKEN

Washington Newspaper Declares Roosevelt Promised Taft He Would Not Run.

Washington.—The Washington Evening Star displays prominently on its first page the following statement:

"From sources entirely independent of the White House it is ascertained that the confidence entertained by the administration and others that Colonel Roosevelt would not be a candidate against Taft was based on definite and repeated statements by Colonel Roosevelt made within a year that he would not be a candidate in 1912 and did not intend to oppose President Taft for renomination."

Boston.—Although Col. Theodore Roosevelt has declared his intention of making a "straight out fight" for the presidential nomination, he let it be known that he would not be drawn into personal controversy by the present administration.

Colonel Roosevelt repeated his statement that he had not taken his present position for personal reasons.

KNOX ARRIVES AT COLON

United States Cruiser Washington at Anchor in Harbor There With Secretary on Board.

Colon, Panama.—The United States cruiser Washington, with Philander C. Knox, secretary of state, and party on board, anchored in the harbor here.

When Secretary Knox landed at the quay he was met by a number of prominent municipal and government officials, who extended greetings. A large crowd of American residents and citizens of Colon cheered the state secretary as he stepped on shore.

The secretary of state with his party traveled to the railroad station and stepped aboard the train for Panama City.

Find Girl Crucified.

Berlin.—At a masque ball at Herford, in Westphalia, a young girl was found crucified in the ballroom. It is believed that she went into a cataleptic trance during a fit of religious frenzy and attempted to portray the crucifixion.

Aviator Falls 200 Feet; Unhurt.

San Bernardino, Cal.—Aviator Harvey Crawford of Los Angeles fell 200 feet and miraculously escaped death here when his aeroplane became unmanageable.

MUTINY IN PEKING

CHINESE SOLDIERS START A REIGN OF TERROR AND PILLAGE IN CAPITAL.

FOREIGNERS ESCAPE THE MOB

Yuan's Troops Slay, Loot and Burn—Many Natives Killed or Wounded in Streets—Missionaries Are Well Armed and Safe.

Peking.—Many natives was killed or wounded in Peking during a mutiny of Yuan Shi Kai's troops.

So far as known, all foreigners are safe. The legation quarter is crowded, but the missionaries are holding forth in their own compound.

The American minister, W. J. Calhoun, consulted with the American missions by telephone. All the missionaries express preference not to leave their compounds.

The Methodists are within a block of the legation quarter and can be rescued easily if endangered.

Two or three American families have not been heard from, but it is presumed no harm has come to them.

When the outbreak started it was estimated 2,000 soldiers took part, but the mutineers were later augmented by large numbers of the police, coolies and loafers.

The mutinous soldiers looted everywhere from house to house. They did not spare even foreign residences within a block of the legation quarter.

Fires were started in various sections and territory of more than a mile in area was burned. This stretches from the Forbidden City to the building of the Chinese foreign board, where Yuan Shi Kai resides. The flames reached within half a mile of the legations.

There was much reckless shooting. One shell, which fell into the compound of the American legation, tore through the tent of an American soldier, but did not explode.

The American is the most exposed legation, lying outside the main quadrangle of the quarter. The American end of Legation street, is the only unenclosed section.

The legations know no reasons for the outbreak. The idea is expressed that Yuan Shi Kai's soldiers began the trouble when they learned that he intended to leave the capital for Nanking. Soon after the mutiny began the quarters occupied by the Nanking delegates who came to notify President Yuan of his elections as president were enveloped in flames.

The mutineers ran through the streets, burning and plundering on all sides. Thousands of shops were looted, principally those of dealers in gold and silver and pawnbrokers. Fusillades of shots were fired to intimidate the inmates. Several of the shopkeepers who failed to surrender their valuables were shot or bayonetted.

BRITISH COAL STRIKE ON

Eight Hundred Thousand Miners Quit Work—Government Will Enforce Minimum Wage Scale.

London.—The settlement of the coal strike is far off. The government has not been able to induce all the coal owners to agree to the demand for a minimum wage made by the miners, but Premier Asquith declared that if the principle of a minimum wage was not enforced by agreement it would be made effective by other means employed by the government.

Fully 800,000 miners have quit work. They will not resume work until an agreement satisfactory to the miners' federation is reached. They have the government behind them and feel that victory has been won.

Chancellor Lloyd-George is drafting a minimum wage bill, but it is said the government is hopeful of being able to effect the establishment of a minimum wage without recourse to legislation, now that the Welsh mine owners see that they are powerless to resist longer.

Some of the railways have sent out notifications of curtailment of their services owing to the strike.

Mr. Asquith told the Miners' Federation, the government was determined that the minimum wage should become "part and parcel of the organization by whatever appropriate means the government can command." The government felt it was face to face with a warfare between capital and labor in the coal industry, which might paralyze all other industries in the country.

The conclusion the government reached was, he said, that a case had been made out for insuring to the underground workers in the coal industry, with adequate safeguards, a reasonable minimum wage. Already a majority—certainly 60 per cent. of the coal owners of the country had assented to the government's proposals.

Jack London Signs as Sailor.

Baltimore, Md.—To satisfy his ambition to round the horn in a square rigged Yankee clipper, Jack London has signed as one of the crew of the Dirigo, which will leave for Seattle this week with a load of coal. Mrs. London will accompany him.

Won't Let Justices Marry.

Trenton, N. J.—A bill prohibiting justices of the peace from performing marriages in New Jersey awaits Governor Wilson's signature, it having passed both houses of the legislature.

REBELS TAKE JUAREZ

MEXICAN TOWN CAPTURED EASILY BY INSURGENTS.

U. S. Troops Watch Attack Ready to Cross Border If El Paso Is Endangered.

El Paso, Tex.—The Vasquista rebels are now in full possession of Juarez They marched into the town, firing only one or two volleys and meeting no resistance, except a few shots in reply to their first volley. They captured the machine guns that had been bought to repel the attackers, took charge of the municipal offices, the customs house, the barracks, the jail and other public buildings.

Mexican Consul E. C. Llorente of El Paso afterward said the officers decided not to make resistance to avoid complications with the United States. United States troops patrolled the border at the time the attack was made, apparently ready to enter Juarez if El Paso should be endangered.

Guadalajara, Mex.—Thirteen rebels were killed and many others wounded in a battle with the state troops fought at Tonoya, near San Gabriel, in the southern part of the state of Jalisco

Marfa, Tex.—The headquarters of the Nelson Morris ranch, opposite Sierra Blanca, is surrounded by insurgents, and a battle between American ranchmen and Mexicans has been going on twelve hours. A band of American cowboys, well armed, have started southward for the Rio Grande, with the determination to release the besieged.

PACKERS LOSE BIG POINT

Judge Admits Records of National Company's Meetings as Competent Evidence Against Defendants.

Chicago.—Federal Judge George A. Carpenter placed a weapon in the hands of the government when he decided that records of meetings of the directors of the National Packing company were competent evidence against the meat packers. Earlier in the trial the court ruled that these records were admissible only in so far as acts of the corporation were concerned.

Ferdinand Sulzberger, head of the packing concern of Sulzberger & Sons company, was called to the witness stand by James M. Sheean, counsel for the government.

The witness said he knew all the defendants. From 1893 to May, 1902, he said he attended meetings of the packers where margins and shipments were agreed upon. Arthur Meeker and Jerome H. Pratt attended for Armour & Co.; G. F. Swift, now dead; Francis A. Fowler, Charles Swift and George Hartwell for Swift & Co., and L. H. Heyman for Morris & Co.

TO BUY EXPRESS COMPANIES

Senator Gardner of Maine Has Plan to Link Business With Postal Service.

Washington.—Senator Gardner of Maine introduced a bill under which the government would take over the properties of express companies and operate them as a part of the postal service, extending the service to the rural delivery. The measure indicates the probable cost of taking over the properties as follows:

Real property, $14,932,169; equipment, $1,381,405; materials and supplies, $138,210; advance payments on contracts, $5,836,663, and franchises, good will, etc., $10,877,369. Total, $39,165,819.

TAFT ASKS STRIKE INQUIRY

Directs Attorney General to Act While Both Houses of Congress Discuss Matter.

Washington.—The Lawrence mill strike occupied the attention of both houses of congress, President Taft and Attorney General Wickersham. Two resolutions directing an investigation of conditions by federal authorities were introduced, but no action on them was taken.

President Taft, however, at the request of Representative Berger, asked Attorney General Wickersham to learn whether any federal laws had been violated by officials who prevented the removal of children from the strike district

GET MEN WHO STOLE $25,000

New York Police Reported to Have Trapped Bandits Who Held Up Bank Messengers.

New York.—The continuation of the epidemic of robberies and holdups in this city was accompanied by reports that Deputy Police Commissioner Dougherty's detectives had closed a net around the perpetrators of the sensational $25,000 taxicab robbery. The five men who held up the taxicab occupied by two bank messengers in the heart of the financial district have been at large ten days.

Fire Sweeps Lumber Yards.

Attleboro, Mass.—A fire loss of $200,000 was caused by a blaze in the lumber yard of C. A. Pullen & Co near the Pawtucket line. The fire is attributed to sparks from a locomotive.

NERVOUS HEADACHE

And Numbness in the Hands and Arms.

This Iowa Woman Was in a Serious Condition and Her Cure Will Interest Many.

A cure of unusual interest and importance is related by Mrs. J. H. Morgon, of Correctionville, Iowa. After being a hopeless sufferer from sick headaches, she is now entirely free from attacks. She tells of her cure by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, as follows:

"Some years ago I was in a terribly nervous and run-down condition and suffered greatly from nervous headaches. I was treated for three months by a specialist in Chicago, who advised me to wear glasses, but he did not help me. My head seemed as though it would burst and I had frequent dizzy spells. I was in despair of getting well until I read about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and began taking them. A few boxes cured me and since then I have used them as a family medicine.

"Before the birth of my last child I suffered untold agony with pain and numbness in my hands and arms up to the shoulders. My hands were so swollen and the muscles so sore that I could hardly dress myself. For a time I could not close my left hand. During the day if I kept moving the pain did not seem to be so bad, but my hands were always numb. I again used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and found them good for this trouble also, as they entirely relieved me."

Unless properly treated sick headache is a disease of many years duration, as it occurs before the twentieth year in two-thirds of the cases and recurs with more or less regularity until the fiftieth year or later. It is usually hereditary and is probably directly caused by a defect in the process which changes the food we eat into blood. Most sufferers are troubled with obstinate constipation which makes it necessary to use a laxative.

An ideal combination treatment is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and the new laxative pills, Pinklets. This treatment is fully described in a little booklet, "The Treatment of Sick Headache," which is free on request, together with a sample of Pinklets, the little laxative pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale at all druggists, or will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

Positively Brilliant.

"Did you hear young Pounders playing on the piano just now?"

"Yes. I consider him a remarkable performer."

"How is that?"

"He can hit more wrong keys in less time than any other person I ever saw."

Papa's Past.

Little Helen's mamma was discussing the drink question with a visitor and the child listened gravely to the conversation.

"Papa used to drink," she volunteered suddenly.

The visitor turned her head to conceal a smile, and mamma frowned and shook her head at the little one.

"Well, then," demanded Helen, "what was it he used to do?"—Lippincott's Magazine.

Puzzle of Living.

Religionists chided about their inability to agree on points of faith might point out that they differ only in incidentals and not essentials, whereas the scientists differ on everything. Take the science of living. A week ago you would have "died if you drank water with your meals." Now they say it doesn't do any harm at all. One variety says: "Eat meat, lots of it, to build good, rich blood." Another says meat is poison; that vegetables are the only food. A third declares meat and vegetables both increase debility, and that you will live twice as long on raw fruits and nuts. Some say "Talk with your meals, laugh; it makes the food digest." Others insist silence is never so golden as at the table.

A WOMAN DOCTOR

Was Quick to See That Coffee Poison Was Doing the Mischief.

A lady tells of a bad case of coffee poisoning, and tells it in a way so simple and straightforward that literary skill could not improve it.

"I had neuralgic headaches for 12 years," she says, "and have suffered untold agony. When I first began to have them I weighed 140 pounds, but they brought me down to 110.

"I went to many doctors and they gave me only temporary relief. So I suffered on, till one day, a woman doctor advised me to drink Postum. She said I looked like I was coffee poisoned.

"So I began to drink Postum, and gained 15 pounds in the first few weeks and am still gaining, but not so fast as at first. My headaches began to leave me after I had used Postum about two weeks—long enough, I expect, to get the coffee poison out of my system.

"Now that a few months have passed since I began to use Postum, I can gladly say that I never know what a neuralgic headache is like any more, and it was nothing but Postum that relieved me.

"Before I used Postum I never went out alone; I would get bewildered and would not know which way to turn. Now I go alone and my head is as clear as a bell. My brain and nerves are stronger than they have been for years." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Col. Graham's Umbrella

* * *

By LAWRENCE ALFRED CLAY

(Copyright, 1911, by Associated Literary Press)

Col. Charles Graham, retired and a widower, and also the father of Miss Maude Graham, was walking the floor in one of his tantrums. The colonel was a man of tantrums. He had them every hour of the day if there was the least excuse for it, and he had been known to get up four times during the night to yell at passersby, who were talking, whistling or singing.

The colonel had small tantrums and large tantrums. A small tantrum was discharging the cook after dinner and hiring her over again before breakfast. A large tantrum consisted of striding up and down, waving his arms, kicking at chairs, and exclaiming at his daughter:

"By the blood of Bunker Hill, but I won't stand it—I won't stand it! Do you hear what I say!"

"Yes, father."

"After 14 battles and 22 skirmishes I will not put up with such things. I will appeal to the sword! I will appeal to the law! Why, dem it, girl, I'll—I'll—!"

And he'd go off to take something from a bottle and smoke a cigar and forget all about it. This tantrum was the champion tantrum of weeks. He sat Maude down in a chair, and after drawing a long breath and pounding on the wall with his fist he roared:

"It was your fault—all your fault!"

"I don't see how," was the mild protest.

"No, you don't see how. You never see how! You will never see how till I am dead. Wasn't there a special sale of umbrellas advertised?"

"Yes, father."

"And didn't I go to town to buy one?"

"You did."

"And wasn't it a regular five-dollar umbrella at $3.25?"

"It was."

"And I had had it but a week when I had to go uptown again. You said I had better take the umbrella along as it looked like rain. Don't dispute me!"

"Yes, I said so."

"And I was fool enough to do it; and where is that demnition umbrella now—where—where?"

"And you left it on the train."

"And if you hadn't advised me to take it would I have taken it? And if I hadn't taken it would it have been lost? And now—now I am without a silk umbrella! After 14 battles and 23 skirmishes and an unblemished record of 40 years I have no umbrella! Think of it! Think of it!"

"Ha!" called the man of war.

"But, father, if you hadn't left it on the train," softly answered Miss Maude.

"But I never left it on the train. Some thief among the passengers took it, and I'll run him to earth if it takes ten years! I may have said I thought I left it on the train, but now I know I didn't. I know it was stolen. You advised me to carry it, and it was stolen! A court-martial would convict you in five minutes."

The colonel advertised for the lost or stolen umbrella. He advertised that he would give a reward of $10 to learn the identity of the thief. When he had discovered it he was going to do things with that thief to make the tortures of the Inquisition seem a farce by comparison. He never expected the advertisement to be answered, but he patted himself on the back after its insertion. He had shown the public that he was no worm to be walked on.

When the colonel had purchased the umbrella he had had his initials "C. G. G." engraved on the handle. He had given them in his ad. Three days later, as he stood at his gate wondering who he could pick a row with, along came a middle-aged man with an umbrella in his hand.

"Ha!" called the man of war.

"Ha! your self!" replied the other. "You are the man that advertised a stolen umbrella, aren't you?"

"Yes, and you've got it there!"

"You go slow, sir! I bought this at a special sale at A. & G.'s, and here's my ticket to prove that I did."

"But there's my initials right there!" shouted the colonel.

"And they are also mine. My name is Cyrus Grant. I've come from town to tell you that you'd better be careful how you fling the word 'thief' around. For two cents I'd have the law on you!"

The colonel flew into the house and told Maude that she had brought about the insult to him, and then discharged the cook without a character, and sat down to remember that there were 12 umbrellas of the same make and style in that lot. That made 11 others just like his. Of course, all the buyers couldn't have initials the same as his, but after an hour he was almost ready to admit to himself that he had been a little hasty—just a bit. For that reason he went out and told the cook that she might stay a day or two longer. That was as far as he would go.

That evening, after dinner, as he had got snugged down in his easy chair for a smoke and a think the doorbell rang in an imperious way, and after a moment a young man was admitted. He carried a rolled umbrella in his hand. The moment Miss Maude caught sight of it she fled from the room.

"Well, sir?" demanded the colonel, without looking at the card the other handed him.

"I am traveling for the house of Perkins & Smith," was the reply.

"Well?"

"A few days ago I bought an umbrella at a special sale."

"Ah! My umbrella—the one stolen from me a few days ago! My initials right here, sir!"

"And they are mine, also! Look at the card in your hand and you will see that I am Claude Gillette. I have read your ad., sir, and am here to demand an apology. I am being twitted by all my friends with being an umbrella thief. I can prove that I bought this at A. & G.'s sir."

The colonel wouldn't apologize. The best he would do was to discharge the cook again and try to make himself believe that both men were liars. Next day a third man appeared. He had a rolled umbrella in his hand. He was about the colonel's age, and he was also a man who had tantrums.

"Sixty-five years of a record in office and out that cannot be impeached!" he shouted, "and yet the day has come when I am charged with stealing an umbrella! There it is, sir! Look at it! Look at my initials! Look at this ticket to see that it came from A. & G.'s! Apologize, sir—apologize at once! My name, sir, is Clarence Georges."

There were some hot words and threats were made, but the colonel finally cooled down and hired the cook over again. Having discharged her but a few hours before, he must rehire her before he could hand out any more walking papers.

And a fourth man came and talked about arrest and prosecution, and he and the colonel called each other liars. Then the latter, fearing that a fifth man might arrive, went off to his club to play dominoes.

The fifth man came with a rolled umbrella and the initials "C. G." on the handle. He was a young man and he had his interview with Miss Maude just after an exciting episode.

"I saw Col. Graham's advertisement," he said, "and I have called to restore his property. I must have taken it quite by mistake."

"But you didn't," she replied. "You couldn't, you see, for here is his. I just found it in his room. He didn't have it with him at all that day."

"Then—then—"

Then they both smiled. Then they both laughed. Then the colonel appeared and said it was funny, and the cook must be discharged, and—and—"

If frequent calls at the colonel's residence by Mr. Claude Gorham means anything, they mean that Miss Maude favored him as a caller.

Luxurious Aerial Traveling.

Bleriat has built for Henri Deutsch de la Meurthe a veritable aerial taxicab. The machine has a body which looks for all the world like that of a taxicab body. The passengers enter by a side door and view the landscape below through mica windows. Pneumatic cushions protect the passengers in rough landings. The pilot sits in front of the machine like a true chauffeur, and controls the machine with regular Bleriat cloche and foot tiller.

The Reason.

"Don't be so blue. Don't give way to your feelings; take a good grip."

"You idiot, the only reason I'm blue is because I've got the grip."

Domestic Weather.

"Jibbers calls his wife a catamaran."

"Shocking! Why does he do that?"

"Because she is so hard to manage in a storm."

GOVERNOR GREETS

SENDS LETTER OF FELICITATION TO MRS. ROSET SCHMAHL ON HER LEAP YEAR BIRTHDAY.

SURVIVOR OF MASSACRE

Of the Sioux Indians in 1862—Molded Bullets for Soldiers' Day After Birth of Son at Fort Ridgley.

St. Paul.—Mrs. Roset Schmahl, pioneer heroine of the Indian massacre of 1862 and mother of Julius Schmahl, secretary of state, was handed a telegram from Governor Eberhart, congratulating her upon the completion of her eighty-third year. Although Mrs. Schmahl was 84 years, she celebrated her twenty-first birthday, as February 29 comes only once in four years.

The Governor's letter follows:

Recognizing your invaluable services to the state in the trying times of its early history and ranking you as one of its most honored citizens, I want to join in the congratulations of your host of friends on your birthday anniversary, bespeaking for you continued health and prosperity.

In the early days of the Minnesota settlements Mrs. Schmahl and her husband settled in St. Paul and went from here to Traverse des Sioux, where they engaged in the hotel business. Their hotel was the stopping place of Alexander Ramsey, Henry M. Rice and the other early state officials. It was at their hotel that Ramsey met the Indians and paid them their allotments.

Later the Schmahl family moved to Fort Ridgley, where they were at the time of the Sioux massacre of 1862. They were living in a stone farm house near the fort and when the Fifth Minnesota troops came past the farm they forced the family to go to the fort. Twelve hours later all of the persons who had not gone to the fort were massacred.

It was in the fort that Mrs. Schmahl gave birth to Herman G. Schmahl, now a merchant at Redwood Falls. The next day she was molding bullets for the soldiers and helping to care for the wounded. After the defeat of the Indians the family returned to Traverse and later went to Redwood Falls. A few years ago Mrs. Schmahl moved to Duluth and is now living with her daughter, Mrs. John J. Polmer. Of the ten children born to Mrs. Schmahl only six are living. Alexander C., Herman G. and Julius A. Schmahl; Mrs. George Wiagett of Dent, Minn.; Mrs. M. Liebenguth of Alexandria and Mrs. John J. Palmer of Duluth.

PARKER SCHOOL FACULTY

Several Instructors Already Secured for Opening of Methodist Institution.

Winnebago.—The following instructors have been chosen for Parker college, when it opens in September under the management of President E. V. Du Bois as a Methodist institution: History and military discipline, E. H. Schuey, principal of the high school at Rochester; science, Professor Redham of Illinois; German and elementary English, Miss Helen S. Severtson, Chicago; voice, Miss Lena Pritchar, of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston; expression and physical culture, Miss Zola C. Merman, Chicago; art, Miss Sarah Scabraak, Chicago. The remainder of the faculty will be elected within the next few days.

SPELLING MATCH IS HELD

Close Contest at Osakis Between Douglas and Todd County Lads.

Alexandria.—In a spelling contest between the seventh and eighth grade pupils of Douglas and Todd counties, held at Osakis, the Douglas county children won by a small margin, one boy only standing when the last boy on the Todd county side took his seat. The winner was Arthur Johnson of Nelson, Douglas county. The last contestant on the Todd county team was Lester Judd. Each side was represented by twenty scholars. T. A. Erickson, superintendent of schools of Douglas, and Victor Knutson, superintendent of schools of Todd county, each selected 200 test words, only a few of which remained unspelled at the close of the contest.

Ten Nights in a Barroom.

Minneapolis.—The attraction that comes to the Bijou, Minneapolis, the week of March 10th, will be a revival of "Ten Nights in a Barroom," with all the features and scenic accessories that have rendered this great drink play immortal.

LOSES LIFE IN SAW

Young Man Feeding Slabs in Sawmill is Caught in Machine.

St. Cloud.—John Hentges, 21 years old, residing near Richmond, this county, died as the result of injuries suffered while working in his father's portable sawmill. The young man was feeding slabs to the circular saw, when a portion of the slab became entangled in the saw and drew both the victim and the timber into the machine. Both of Hentges' legs were horribly lacerated.

CLOSED SEASON FOR DOES

Suggestion in the Hope of Conserving Minnesota's Supply of Deer.

Minneapolis.—A closed season for a period of years against the killing of does in the North woods, is advocated by H. A. Rider, executive agent of the state game and fish commission. Legislation to this end would meet with approval of the commission, and serve to prevent the great slaughter of the female deer.

"If they could be protected for a while," Mr. Rider said, "and hunters be allowed to kill only the bucks, the deer would multiply more rapidly. The number of hunters increases each year and it is impossible to tell just how many deer are slaughtered annually. The law passed at the last session of the Legislature limiting the number to be killed by any hunter, to one, helped the situation materially, but does not protect."

It is pointed out that because of the timidity of the doe and her keen scent of danger, opportunity for killing is less than in the case of bucks. And yet, few hunters hesitate to take a shot at the animal because of its sex.

Mr. Rider does not believe in the efficacy of a law requiring big game hunters to undergo examination as to hunting knowledge, before being awarded a license. Dr. C. E. French of Duluth has suggested the passage of a law requiring applicants for license to prove their ability to distinguish a deer from a horse or cow at a distance of 300 yards.

Records in the game and fish commission office show that during the last open season, numerous fatalities and accidents in the woods occurred because of carelessness. One record shows where a hunter after a day away from camp, came home and carefully shot both his own horses, believing he was killing deer. Another shot two Jersey cows, while a third shot a mule. An estimate sent out from Chicago said that 100 men were killed throughout the United States while deer hunting in 1911.

PRISONERS ARE MOVED

Nine Men Taken From St. Cloud to Stillwater Prison.

Stillwater.—Nine men have been transferred from the state reformatory at St. Cloud to the state prison for incorrigibility. Six of them were sentenced to the reformatory from Hennepin county, they being Jan Miller, robbery first degree, sentenced Sept. 23, 1911; Paul C. Kelly, forgery third, July 24, 1910; William W. Franklin, robbery, third degree, Sept. 18, 1911; William P. Steffind, burglary third, June 2, 1911; John Frew, grand larceny in second, Sept. 28, 1911; Harry M. Adams, burglary third. The other transfers were Archie McCay sent up from Wadena county for burglary in the third degree, July 29, 1911; Charley Cook, Goodhue county, grand larceny, Aug. 24, 1911; Louis Gross, Winona county, burglary third, Sept. 11, 1911.

Three white men and two negroes have been also admitted upon new sentences, making the prison population 805, the largest in its history.

VOTERS TO DECIDE.

Proposition for Commission Government to Be Submitted to Virginia.

Virginia.—The progressive league is planning to carry on a campaign for the adoption of the commission form of government. The city charter commission has been reorganized for the purpose of considering several proposed amendments, and will consider a proposition to submit to the voters the commission form of government. The league is satisfied to have the charter commission take up the proposition, but the league members purpose to have the matter submitted to the voters in due time whether the charter commission is favorable to it or not. Mayor Hawkinson, Aldermen E. C. Johnson, Mayor-elect M. A. Murphy, Alderman-elect R. J. McGhee and others in official life have already declared in favor of commission government.

BOOM AT VIRGINIA.

Seventeen Business Structures Constructed During Fall and Winter.

Virginia.—Seventeen new business apartments were added to local improvements this winter and all of them have been leased and most of them are now occupied or they will be occupied by the middle of next month, with the result that the demand for store rooms is almost as heavy as last year. It is expected that the Elks will this year erect a $25,000 business block and headquarters, and there are several other building projects, which will relieve the situation. Last year was the biggest in the history of the city in the building of business blocks, and it is anticipated that this will be the biggest year in the construction of residences, though a large number were completed in 1911.

HAY FAMINE NEEDLESS.

State Officials Say Crop Could Be Increased Tenfold.

There is no excuse for a hay famine in Minnesota, according to Immigration Commissioner H. J. Maxfield and Forester W. T. Cox. Thousands of acres of grass land, unequalled anywhere in the country, now lie waste, while the southern sections of the state must pay fancy prices for hay. Mr. Maxfield believes that the hay crop can be increased at least tenfold.

CONGRESSIONAL DOINGS.

Miller and Stevenson Introduce Bills Affecting Minnesota.

Washington, D. C.—Representative C. B. Miller of Duluth introduced a bill for the establishment of a hospital for the Chippewas of Minnesota to cost $100,000. The bill provides that the hospital shall be open to all the Chippewas of Minnesota, and is to be under the control of a board of five governors, three to be appointed by the governor of Minnesota, one by the secretary of the Interior, and one to be chosen by the Indians.

The bill provides that one part of the hospital be devoted to the care of tuberculosis patients, one part to other contagious diseases, and one part to patients suffering from old age, disability or other bodily infirmities. Admission to the hospital would be upon order of a majority of the board of governors. The hospital is to be in charge of a physician who is to receive a salary of $2,500 a year.

Would Settle Land Titles.

Washington.—Representative Steenerson introduced a bill designed to give relief to a large number of settlers in the White Earth reservation by quieting the title to the 2,800 allotments which have not been brought into question by federal law suits.

There are now approximately 1,200 allotments being challenged by the governments, and because of this situation the titles to all neighboring allotments have become clouded. It is to remedy this situation that Mr. Steenerson has introduced his bill.

One provision of the bill is to the effect that the federal authorities shall have 90 days in which to bring suit against any of the allotments affected by his measure, but after that time, no action can be brought against the title of the lands.

Appropriation High Dam Work.

Washington.—The river and harbors appropriation bill contains an appropriation of $1,250,000 for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi river from St. Louis to Minneapolis, and $200,000 for continuing construction of the high dam in the Mississippi river in the vicinity of Minneapolis. Other Minnesota items contained in the bill are the following: Warroad river, for maintenance of channel, $3,200; Duluth harbor, for continuing improvement at Superior entrance, $150,000; Red River of the North, $17,000, for continuing improvements and for resurvey looking toward additional improvement; survey of old canal route between Mississippi river and Lake Superior with a view to permanent improvement, St. Croix river, to be surveyed for future improvement.

SHOW NORTH'S PRODUCTS

Thirty-two Minnesota Counties Exhibit in Minneapolis.

Minneapolis.—A permanent display of Northern Minnesota products has been opened at 39 Third street south, Minneapolis, by the Northern Minnesota Development association, composed of thirty-two counties of that section of the state. The exhibit is in charge of W. R. Mackenzie, secretary of the association, and is designed to advertise in the vicinity of the Twin City the agricultural and industrial possibilities in the counties represented.

Each county has a separate display. Those represented are Mille Lacs, Kanabec, Benton, Stearns, Morrison, Todd, Aitkin, Carlton, St. Louis, Lake, Cook, Itasca, Koochiching, Beltrami, Cass, Crow Wing, Wadena, Hubbard, Becker, Clay, Norman, Mahnomen, Clearwater, Polk, Red Lake, Pennington, Marshall, Roseau, Kittson, Isanti, Pine and Wilkin.

THIRD SET OF TEETH

Aged Minnesota Woman Also Getting New Crop of Hair.

Big Lake, Minn.—Mrs. John S. Putnam, aged 83 years, a pioneer resident of Big Lake, is now cutting her third set of teeth having been without teeth for 16 years. Moreover, after being without hair for 40 years, she is now the possessor of a fine head of hair.

Mr. and Mrs. Putnam moved here from Massachusetts in 1856 when Minnesota was a territory. Mr. Putnam died 12 years ago. She is the mother of nine children, five of whom are living. Forty-one grandchildren and 15 great grandchildren also are in the family. Mrs. Putnam now lives with her son, Postmaster E. E. Putnam of Big Lake.

NEW SCHOOL IN WAHKON

Mille Lacs County District Votes Overwhelmingly for Bonds.

Wahkon.—At a special election held here Independent School District No. 33, by a vote of 57 to 1, authorized an issue of bonds in the sum of $26,000 to the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of building a new schoolhouse. The district recently was reorganized under the Holmberg act of 1910. It will have eight school rooms, as well as provision for manual training and domestic science departments. Bids for the construction of the building will be called soon and an effort will be made to commence work about the 1st of May, so that it will be ready for occupancy at the opening of the next school year.

Minnesota No. 13 Indorsed for Seed.

Bemidji.—Sixteen boys, members of the agricultural department of the Bemidji high school, have completed experiments with Minnesota No. 13 seed corn, with the result that the corn is pronounced to be almost perfect. This corn will be used on the school demonstration farm here. At Northern, near here, the students have organized an industrial club to study farming. Experiments are being conducted by pupils to ascertain the relative evils of the different weed seeds which are found in grains.

$3.50 Recipe Free, For Weak Kidneys.

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, Etc.

Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say good-bye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K-2068 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

A Beautiful Decline.

Ollie James, the gigantic and genial congressman and senator-elect from Kentucky, was in conversation the other day with a Washingtonian when the latter made certain inquiries with reference to a mutual friend whom he had not seen for a number of years.

"And how does Colonel Prescott spend his declining years?" he asked.

"Beautifully, sir; beautifully!" answered James. "He has a fine farm, sir. A string of trotters, sir. And a barrel of whisky 16 years old—and a wife of the same age, sir!"

Some men don't know very much, but they don't know it.

Particularly the Ladies.

Not only pleasant and refreshing to the taste, but gently cleansing and sweetening to the system, Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna is particularly adapted to ladies and children, and beneficial in all cases in which a wholesome, strengthening and effective laxative should be used. It is perfectly safe at all times and dispels colds, headaches and the pains caused by indigestion and constipation so promptly and effectively that it is the one perfect family laxative which gives satisfaction to all and is recommended by millions of families who have used it and who have personal knowledge of its excellence.

Its wonderful popularity, however, has led unscrupulous dealers to offer imitations which act unsatisfactorily. Therefore, when buying, to get its beneficial effects, always note the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—plainly printed on the front of every package of the genuine Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879.

WRITEING ON THE WALL.

The poll of Wisconsin, Minesota Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana, taken by the St. Paul Disoatch, shows 8,228 for Roosevelt, 4,856 for LaFoollete, Eugene Debs, socialist, 1,243, Bryan, 1,235 and Taft 791.

It will be seen that Debs, the socialist beat Taft 452 votes in hese states, and it must be remembered that these votes came rom subscribers of the Dispatch, a aper that has been suppoting Mr. aft, and then the Republicans alk about running him for president. "Gee white," what do you hink of that? Why if tho Northwestern Agriculturelist should take a vote of their subscribers, old "Reciprocity" Taft, couldent aise 10 votes, out of 5000. The farmers are camping on Tafts trail and they are going to get him.

It is strange that the leaders of the republican party can not see that Taft has lost the confidence of the American people and that they will not vote for him, and if he is nominated ho will scatter the party like whirlwinds scatters chaff, and will be tho worst defented man that ever ran for president of the United States.

One year from last Monday "Reciprocity" Taft will take a walk out of the white house. No matter who takes his place the people are sure to not get chented. Republican, Democrat, Socialist, Prohibition, anything but Taft.

The current issue of THE SUNBEAM makes the Thief River Falls Times editor laugh. That's right! Ha, ha, ha, but you had better remember the fellow that lughed before he tried to throw the bull ver the fence. Laugb now for ou will soon have no laugh comming.

We understand that petitions ill be circulated to have a government dam put in at the outlet f Red Lake. Do not sign it, for a emonstance will be gotten up gainst it. If the lumber companya can get a dam put in there, ith old Major Shurk to manage , they have got us by the neck.

J. Adam Bede, in his Budget, efers to Bryan as the big bull uffalo of the herd, and says give im one more run before we fence e pasture. We are of the opinin that if Bryan should again run ginst Taft, this year, that he ould defeat him so bad that old aft would not know he was in o race. In fact we will bet that is the tall ender in the race, he gets the nomination.

With Gordon and Lee runing on early the same platform "sorry" berhart had ought to have prety easy sledding to get the repuican nomination, but he may d in the "also ran" class after e fall election, and him and state machine become a total eck. It would not be any calamy to loose our present game and Commission, as a rottner one uld not be found in the state

Taft says: "There are those o do not believe that all people fitted for popular government. e fact is we know they are not. [illegible] of us dare not say so, BUT [illegible]." We are called upon now of the Bar to say whether we going to protect The Institu- of the Judiciary and continue INDEPENDENT of the Majorof ALL THE PEOPLE." [illegible] until ALL the people get back at you Taft, and you will [illegible] boost out of that chair.

DIFFERENT IN CANADA.

At the point where the Red River and tho Saskatchowan, join in Canada, our Thief River Falls lumber company, who are lumbering up there, took a notion to put in a boom, and they got Mr. Draper, from Thief River Falls to go up there and drive pileing in the river and fix up a boom, just to suit them selves. Then a complint was made to the government, that they were blocking up the river, and the govornment never ordered any investigation, by officials like Major Shunk, but they promptly ordered them to get that boom out of there, and gave them until May 1st, to clear the channel of that river. The above are facts, which would lead one to the conclusion that it was no wonder that Canada feard annexation to a country where the rivers were under the control of the lumer companys. We understand that the Representutives of T. R. F. lumber companys cried when they found that it would not do them any good to have Major Shunk of St. Paul certify that there was no log booms there, and recommend, "that no action be taken." They have got to get their log jams out of that river p-d-q-, for that's the way they do business in Canada.

A Record Hailstorm.

One of the worst hailstorms ever known in the United States occurred Sept. 5, 1898, in Nodaway county, Missouri. The path of the storm was about three miles wide and eighteen miles long. Its greatest violence being felt over a region of four square miles east of Clarmont. At one point in this region the fall of hail was so heavy that a drift unprotected by artificial means remained lying on the ground for four weeks after the storm. At the end of that time people in the neighborhood were found gathering the hail for the purpose of making ice cream. During the storm cylindrical pieces of ice were picked up four inches long by about two and a half in diameter. The growing corn was practically all destroyed. In a field of eighty acres only one stalk was left standing.—Chicago News.

A View of Jefferson Davis.

Very straight and tall, thin, with a clear cut, clean shaven, distinguished face, with a look half military man, half student, with a demeanor to fill of perfect if somewhat chilling courtesy; by temperament a theorist, able with the ability of the field marshal or the scholar in the study, not with that of the reader and master of men, the hardest of workers, devoted, honorable, single minded, a figure on which a fierce light has beaten; a man not perfect nor always just, bound in the toils of his own personality, but yet an able man, who suffered and gave all, believed in himself and in his cause and to the height of his power labored for it day and night. Such a man was Jefferson Davis.—Mary Johnston in "The Long Roll."

Conquered.

"No," snapped the hard featured woman, opening the kitchen door about six inches, "and, to be perfectly plain with you"—

"You couldn't, marm," gallantly interposed Tuffold Knull, lifting his tattered remnant of a hat—"you couldn't be otherwise than perfectly harnsome with me!"

"I was going to say," she rejoined, visibly softening, "that, to be plain with you, there is nothing in the house but cold victuals, but if you care to try a plate of warmed over hash you can come in."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Didn't Tire Him.

He had taken pains when he applied for work to assure the farmer that he never got tired. When his new employer went to the field where he had put the man at work he found him lolling on his back under a tree.

"What does this mean?" asked the farmer. "I thought you were a man who never got tired."

"I don't," said the hired man calmly. "This doesn't tire me."—Exchange.

CLEVER BIRD TRICK.

The Wood Nightjar Has a Way of Openly Concealing Itself.

In his book "A Naturalist in the Guianas" Eugene Andre tells of the tricky manner in which one bird fools the hunters. He says:

"The wood nightjar is a difficult bird to detect during the day. He chooses for perching some mottled stump or branch so closely resembling his plumage that he appears to form part of the bough upon which he is sitting. I suppose that in my wanderings I must have passed quite close to a good many of these large nightjars, yet I must confess that only on one occasion did I get a good opportunity of observing the habits of this bird.

"We had had a morning's duck shooting and were resting in the shade of one of the mangrove trees which line the creeks, when what had appeared to me to be a dry stump jutting out of one of the branches seemed to move slightly. I threw lumps of clay and bits of stick at it, but it did not move until it was actually struck, when, to our surprise, a wood nightjar flitted a short distance away, alighting on a stump similar to the one which he had left a moment before. He immediately flattened his tail against his perch and assumed an attitude which gave him all the appearance of being part of the stump on which he rested.

"I disturbed him repeatedly, and he invariably followed the same tactics. He always chose as resting places stumps or branches which his plumage resembled, and he took a position so suggestive of a piece of wood that I should certainly have passed him by had I not been watching his movements and seen him alight."

A DEAL IN STOCKS.

Comment of the Man Who Witnessed the Quick Transaction.

Sitting at his desk on the tenth floor of a Wall street building the man in charge of the investment department of a Stock Exchange house was discussing the bond market with a visitor. A message from the telegraph room was laid upon his desk. "Pardon me," he said to his visitor as he picked up his telephone instrument and asked for a Philadelphia connection. He immediately replaced the receiver, and the discussion of the bond market was resumed. The telephone bell rang. "Pardon me," said the investment expert again as he lifted the telephone instrument. "I'll take those fifty shares," he said into the telephone.

Evidently he got them. He broke off the connection, wrote a message for the wire and sent it off to the telegraph room by a boy. The discussion of the bond market was resumed once more and continued until another message came from the wire room. The investment expert merely glanced at it and went on with the conversation.

His visitor broke in to ask a question. "Do you mind telling me the nature of that transaction you have just concluded?" "Just then?" said the investment expert. "Why, I bought fifty shares of an investment stock in Philadelphia by telephone and sold them in Columbus, O., by our private telegraph wire. What about it?" "Oh, nothing," said the visitor, "only it occurred to me that a few years ago it might have taken four weeks instead of four minutes to do it." Then they went on with their talk about the bond market.—New York Post.

His Preference.

A distinguished eye surgeon tells a good story of his hospital days. Three other young, newly fledged oculists and himself were chatting in their quarters in the hospital when the conversation turned, as was natural in young men, upon the beauty of different colors of eyes. One championed the superior brilliancy and sparkle of the blue eye, another the depth and fire of the brown, while the third was all for the clear, cool light of the hazel. After they had exhausted their eloquence, with the usual effect of confirming themselves in their original opinions, the fourth young sawbones suddenly broke in: "I don't care a hang about your blue eyes or your brown eyes or your gray eyes! Just give me sore eyes and plenty of 'em, and I'll be happy."—Saturday Evening Post.

London's First Directory.

How did the world do its business before the publication of directories? The huge directory of London had a first printed forerunner in a slim little volume, "A Collection of the Names of the Merchants Living in and Around the City of London," issued by Samuel Lee of Lombard street in 1677. It was the outcome most probably of the enterprise of Henry Robinson, a well known writer on commercial matters, who in 1650 opened an office in Threadneedle street, where were kept "particular registers of all manner of addresses" for the use of all who cared to pay a sixpence.—London Chronicle.

Why the Romans Decreased.

The visiting member of the board of education was examining a class in history, and of one of the brightest pupils he asked the question, "Why did the population of Rome decrease just before the fall of the empire?"

The reply came promptly from a little girl, "Because the Romans had ceased to practice husbandry."

Last night we received the full report from Washington, about log jams in Red Lake River. The lumber companys win, and the goverment declines to interfeer in any way. This closes the first round and is of course a declaration of war, between the settlers and the lumber companys. We bought this land of the government and paid them for it, and will not be driven from our homes by the lumber companys. If it must come to a Camron dam fight, let it come, and they will not find one John Deitz, to fight, but thousands of them. This decision means that the lumber companys can dam up and shut off this river at anytime, and that St. Paul engineers outfit will sware that they never touched it. The facts are before you. A Certain Silver Sixpence.

Beau Brummel had a very odd way of accounting for the changes which took place in his affairs at this time. "He used," observes one of his friends at Caen, "when talking about his altered circumstances, to say that up to a particular period of his life everything prospered with him and that he attributed his good luck to the possession of a certain silver sixpence with a hole in it, which somebody had given him years before with an injunction to take good care of it, as everything would go well with him so long as he did and vice versa if he happened to lose it. The promised prosperity attended him for many years while he held the sixpence fast; but, having at length in an evil hour unfortunately given it by mistake to a hackney coachman, a complete reverse of his previous good fortune took place and one disastrous occurrence succeeded another till actual ruin overtook him at last and obliged him to expatriate himself."—Captain Jesse.

Origin of the "Three R's."

The famous toast to "the three R's—reading, 'riting and 'rithmetic"—was made by Sir William Curtis, lord mayor of London, in the year 1795 and for many years one of the wardens of the tower. What made it more ludicrous was that he proposed it at a dinner given by the London board of education. It was received with great applause and drunk amid much merriment. At the time it was recognized as a jest, but was afterward taken up in earnest by the mayor's detractors, who have handed his name down to posterity as a blundering ignoramus. A writer has now come to his defense and says that when he was a boy an aged member of the board of education assured him that Sir William knew better and that he really used his famous alliteration as a jest. To many people, however, the story will always sound better when it is based upon the belief that Sir William was really serious.

BUILT BY GHOSTS.

An Invisible Wall That Comes and Goes In a Mexican House.

Down in Mexico there are ghosts which build walls.

In the ancient city of Querendaro stands a big one story house of great age which, at the time that General Diaz first became president, was occupied by one of his adherents, a fine old fighter named Colonel Marron. When he died the place was bought by a lawyer named Valdomars, who pulled the whole inside of the house to pieces and put in electric bells and an electric lighting plant.

Curious noises were heard, pictures fell and various queer happenings gave rise to much talk, but the climax came when a servant, sent into the dining room for a glass of water, came back with a scared face and reported that some one had built a wall oll across the room.

The others rushed in. There was nothing to be seen; but, sure enough, when they tried to cross the room an invisible wall barred the way. The wall was so hard and solid that when they struck their knuckles against it they bled.

Next morning, however, the wall was gone, but not for good. Sometimes it was there, sometimes not, and after a few weeks of this sort of thing the Valdemars had had enough of it and moved out.

To this day the house stands unoccupied.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

MYSTERY IN A CRATER.

An Arizona Puzzle That the Geologists Cannot Solve.

About forty miles from Flagstaff, Ariz., in the midst of a great plain, there is a saucer shaped hollow about three-quarters of a mile across and 600 feet deep. The rim of this strange crater rises between 150 and 200 feet above the surrounding plain. Rocky fragments are scattered for several miles around the crater. Among these rocks many fragments of meteoric iron, some containing minute black diamonds, have been found. The inner walls show that the crust of the earth was broken when the crater was formed, yet no volcanic rocks exist there.

Geologists have offered several theories to account for this singular phenomenon. One is that an immense meteorite made the hole and that the meteoric fragments just mentioned are remnants of the falling star.

Another theory ascribes the origin of the crater to a tremendous explosion of steam in the rocks beneath, and a third combines the first two by suggesting that the blow of a falling meteor, striking the earth's crust at a point where subterranean water had accumulated in the neighborhood of heated rocks, was the cause of the explosion.—New York Press.

Plants Breaking Up an Island.

The layman would scarcely associate great strength with so delicate and fragile a thing as maidenhair fern, yet if its roots have not sufficient room they will break the pot in which the plant grows. Blades of grass will force the curbstones between which they spring up out of their place, and in a single night a crop of small mushrooms has been known to lift a large stone. Indeed, plants are on record as having broken the hardest rocks.

The Island of Aldabra, to the northwest of Madagascar, is becoming smaller through the action of the mangroves that grow along the foot of the cliffs. They eat their way into the rock in all directions, and into the gaps thus formed the waves force their way. In time this will probably reduce the island to pieces.—London Telegraph.

Shaving the Bridegroom.

The shaving of the bridegroom on his wedding day is a Bulgarian custom which, handed down from pre-Christian days, is still observed with due formality, especially in country districts. While the barber is at his task a dancing crowd of young folks surrounds him and the bridegroom. As the latter's hair is cut the clippings are carefully collected by some of the girls for preservation in one of the bride's chests. The barber, when his work is done, receives a small white linen cloth as a present and also a trifling sum of money from each person there. Then the bridegroom kisses the hands of the girls, washes his face and dons his wedding dress, which must first be carefully weighed three times by one of the boys.

The Boston and New York Mail.

The first mail between New York and Boston was established in 1672. The letters were carried by a messenger, who was directed to "go and return as often as once a month." This monthly service seems to have been sufficient for some thirty years, when it was changed to a fortnightly service. In 1693 a well organized system of postoffices was established in Pennsylvania and in other localities.—New York American.

His Tribute to His Wife.

The following obituary notice was published in a German paper:

"Today red, tomorrow dead. So it was with my wife, who only seven days ago was springing over bench and table, and was buried yesterday. During her life she was a live woman, who did not easily mistake an X for a U. For that reason everybody can tell the extent of my sorrow: so young and so merry, and now buried. What is human life? I have said to myself repeatedly within the past few days, and also yesterday in the church yard when I paid the sexton, who will also keep the grave mound in order. So cheerful a wife I shall certainly never, never find again, and therefore my sorrow is a righteous one. I wish that heaven preserves any man from a similar sad fate, and thanks for the flowers, as well as the Herr Cantor, the music master of the choir, for the grave hymn, which went through and through me, but was very well sung. Ackerman, Master Locksmith."

Not the Silent Partner.

"I want to telegraph $25 to Chicago," said a man to the clerk in a Boston telegraph office recently.

"The name, please," asked the receiving teller, a good looking young woman behind the counter, whose age might have been twenty-five.

"It's for Mrs. Mary K. Brown, 175 —— avenue," answered the man.

"Your name, too, please," again questioned the young woman.

"My name is Henry Brown; I'm the other half of the firm," answered the man.

"The money goes to the silent partner, eh?" good naturedly remarked the young woman.

"Not on your life she isn't!" answered the man. "Nothing silent about her. She's made more noise for the last two weeks for this $25 than you can imagine. She's the noisy partner of the firm, and she makes good with the title too."—Boston Traveler.

BURNING DAYLIGHT

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his [illegible] birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling, in which over $100,000 is staked. Harnish loses his money and his mine but wins the mail contract. He starts on his mail trip with dogs and sledge, telling his friends that he will be in the big Yukon gold strike at the start. Burning Daylight makes a sensationally rapid run across country with the mail, appears at the Tivoli and is now ready to join his friends in a dash to the new gold fields. Deciding that gold will be found in the up-river district Harnish buys two tons of flour, which he declares will be worth its weight in gold, but when he arrives with his flour he finds the big flat desolate. A comrade discovers gold and Daylight reaps a rich harvest.

CHAPTER V.—Continued.

Back in Dawson, though he remained true to his word and never touched hand to pick and shovel, he worked as hard as ever in his life. He had a thousand irons in the fire, and they kept him busy. Heavy as were his expenses, he won more heavily. He took lays, bought half shares, shared with the men he grub-staked, and made personal locations. Day and night his dogs were ready, and he owned the fastest teams; so that when a stampede to a new discovery was on, it was Burning Daylight to the fore through the longest, coldest nights till he blazed his stakes next to Discovery. In one way or another (to say nothing of the many worthless creeks) he came into possession of properties on the good creeks, such as Sulphur, Dominion, Excelsis, Siwash, Cristo, Alhembra and Doolittle. The thousands he poured out flowed back in tens of thousands.

Dawson grew rapidly that winter of 1896. Money poured in on Daylight from the sale of town lots. He promptly invested it where it would gather more. In fact, he played the dangerous game of pyramiding, and no more perilous pyramiding than in a placer camp could be imagined. But he played with his eyes wide open.

Corner lots in desirable locations sold that winter for from ten to thirty thousand dollars. Daylight sent word out over the trails and passes for the newcomers to bring down log-rafts, and, as a result, the summer of 1897 saw his saw mills working day and night, on three shifts, and still he had logs left over with which to build cabins. These cabins, land included, sold at from one to several thousand dollars. Two-story log buildings, in the business part of town, brought him from forty to fifty thousand dollars apiece. These fresh accretions of capital were immediately invested in other ventures. He turned gold over and over, until everything that he touched seemed to turn to gold.

With the summer rush from the Outside came special correspondents for the big newspapers and magazines, and one and all, using unlimited space, they wrote Daylight up; so that, so far as the world was concerned, Daylight loomed the largest figure in Alaska. Of course, after several months, the world became interested in the Spanish War, and forgot all about him; but in the Klondike itself Daylight still remained the most prominent figure.

CHAPTER VI.

It was held by the thousands of hero-worshipping chechaquos that Daylight was a man absolutely without fear. But Betties and Dan MacDonald and other sourdoughs shook their heads and laughed as they mentioned women. And they were right. He had always been afraid of them from the time, himself a lad of seventeen, when Queen Anna, of Juneau, made open and ridiculous love to him. For that matter, he never had known women. Born in a mining-camp where they were rare and mysterious, having no sisters, his mother dying while he was an infant, he had never been in contact with them.

But it was left to the Virgin to give him his final fright. She was found one morning dead in her cabin. A shot through the head had done it, and she had left no message, no explanation. Then came the talk. Some wit, voicing public opinion, called it a case of too much Daylight. She had killed herself because of him. Everybody knew this, and said so. The correspondents wrote it up, and once more Burning Daylight, King of the Klondike, was sensationally featured in the Sunday supplements of the United States. The Virgin had straightened up, so the feature-stories ran, and correctly so. Never had she entered a Dawson City dance-hall. When she first arrived from Circle City, she had earned her living by washing clothes. Next, she had bought a sewing-machine and made men's drill parkas, fur caps, and moosehide mittens. Then she had gone as a clerk into the First Yukon Bank. All this, and more, was known and told, though one and all were agreed that Daylight, while the cause, had been the innocent cause of her untimely end.

And the worst of it was that Daylight knew it was true. Always would he remember that last night he had seen her. He had thought nothing of it at the time; but, looking back, he was haunted by every little thing that had happened. In the light of the tragic event, he could understand everything—her quietness, that calm certitude as if all vexing questions of living had been smoothed out and were gone, and that certain ethereal sweetness about all that she had said and done that had been almost maternal. He remembered the way she had looked at him, how she had laughed when he narrated Mickey Dolan's mistake in staking the fraction on Skookum Gulch. Her laughter had been lightly joyous, while at the same time it had lacked its old-time robustness. Not that she had been grave or subdued. On the contrary, she had been so patently content, so filled with peace. She had fooled him, fool that he was. He had even thought that night that her feeling for him had passed, and he had taken delight in the thought, and caught visions of the satisfying future friendship that would be theirs with this perturbing love out of the way.

And then, when he stood at the door, cap in hand, and said good night. It had struck him at the time as a funny and embarrassing thing, her bending over his hand and kissing it. He had felt like a fool, but he shivered now when he looked back on it and felt again the touch of her lips on his hand. She was saying good-by, an eternal good-by, and he had never guessed. At that very moment, and for all the moments of the evening, coolly and deliberately, as he well knew her way, she had been resolved to die. If he had only known it! Untouched by the contagious malady himself, nevertheless he would have married her if he had had the slightest inkling of what she contemplated. And yet he knew, furthermore, that hers was a certain stiff-kneed pride that would not have permitted her to accept marriage as an act of philanthropy. There had really been no saving her, after all. The love-disease had fastened upon her, and she had been doomed from the first to perish of it.

Six thousand spent the winter of 1897 in Dawson, work on the creeks went on apace, while beyond the passes it was reported that one hundred thousand more were waiting for the spring. Late one brief afternoon, Daylight, on the benches between French Hill and Skookum Hill, caught a wider vision of things. Beneath him lay the richest part of Eldorado Creek, while up and down Bonanza he could see for miles. It was a scene of a vast devastation. The hills, to their tops, had been shorn of trees, and their naked sides showed signs of gorging and perforating that even the mantle of snow could not hide. Beneath him, in every direction, were the cabins of men. But not many men were visible. A blanket of smoke filled the valleys and turned the gray day to melancholy twilight. Smoke arose from a thousand holes in the snow, where, deep down on bed-rock, in the frozen muck and gravel, men crept and scratched and dug, and ever built more fires to break the grip of the frost.

Organization was what was needed, he decided; and his quick imagination sketched Eldorado Creek, from mouth to source, and from mountain top to mountain top, in the hands of one capable management. Even steam-thawing, as yet untried, but bound to come, he saw would be a makeshift. What should be done was to hydraulic the valley sides and benches, and then, on the creek bottom, to use gold-dredges. There was the very chance for another big killing. He had wondered just what was precisely the reason for the Guggenhammers and the big English concerns sending in their high-salaried experts. That was their scheme. That was why they had approached him for the sale of worked-out claims and tailings. They were content to let the small mine-owners gopher out what they could, for there would be millions in the leavings.

And, gazing down on the smoky inferno of crude effort, Daylight outlined the new game he would play, a game in which the Guggenhammers and the rest would have to reckon with him. But along with the delight in the new conception came a weariness. He was tired of the long Arctic years, and he was curious about the Outside—the great world of which he had heard other men talk and of which he was as ignorant as a child. There were games out there to play. It was a larger table, and there was no reason why he with his millions should not sit in and take a hand. So it was, that afternoon on Skookum Hill, that he resolved to play this last best Klondike hand and pull for the Outside. It took time, however. He put trusted agents to work on the heels of great experts, and on the creeks where they began to buy he likewise bought. Wherever they tried to corner a worked-out creek, they found him standing in the way, owning blocks of claims or artfully scattered claims that put all their plans to naught.

Through It All Moved Daylight, Hell-Roaring, Burning Daylight.

Followed wars, truces, compromises, victories, and defeats. By 1898, sixty thousand men were on the Klondike, and all their fortunes and affairs rocked back and forth and were affected by the battles Daylight fought. And more and more the taste for the larger game urged in Daylight's mouth. Here he was already locked in grapples with the great Guggenhammers, and winning, fiercely winning. Possibly the severest struggle was waged on Ophir, the veriest of moose-pastures, whose low-grade dirt was valuable only because of its vastness. The ownership of a block of seven claims in the heart of it gave Daylight his grip, and they could not come to terms. The Guggenhammer experts concluded that it was too big for him to handle, and when they gave him an ultimatum to that effect he accepted and bought them out. The plan was his own, but he sent down to the States for competent engineers to carry it out. In the Rinkabilly watershed, eighty miles away, he built his reservoir, and for eighty miles the huge wooden conduit carried the water across country to Ophir. Estimated at three millions, the reservoir and conduit cost nearer four. Nor did he stop with this. Electric power plants were installed, and his workings were lighted as well as run by electricity. Other sourdoughs, who had struck it rich in excess of all their dreams, shook their heads gloomily, warned him that he would go broke, and declined to invest in so extravagant a venture. But Daylight smiled, and sold out the remainder of his town-site holdings. He sold at the right time, at the height of the placer boom. When he prophesied to his old cronies, in the Moosehorn Saloon, that within five years town lots in Dawson could not be given away, while the cabins would be chopped up for firewood, he was laughed at roundly, and assured that the mother-lode would be found ere that time. But he went ahead, when his need for lumber was finished, selling out his sawmills as well. Likewise, he began to get rid of his scattered holdings on the various creeks, and without thanks to any one he finished his conduit, built his dredges, imported his machinery, and made the gold of Ophir immediately accessible. And he, who five years before had crossed over the divide from Indian River and threaded the silent wilderness, his dogs packing Indian fashion, himself living Indian fashion on straight moose meat, now heard the hoarse whistles calling his hundreds of laborers to work, and watched them toil under the white glare of the arc-lamps.

But having done the thing, he was ready to depart. And when he let the word go out, the Guggenhammers vied with the English concerns and with a new French company in bidding for Ophir and all its plant. The Guggenhammers bid highest, and the price they paid netted Daylight a clean million. It was current rumor that he was worth anywhere from twenty to thirty millions. But he alone knew just how he stood, and that, with his last claim sold and the table swept clean of his winnings, he had ridden his hunch to the tune of just a trifle over eleven millions.

His departure was a thing that passed into the history of the Yukon along with his other deeds. All the Yukon was his guest, Dawson the seat of the festivity. On that one last night no man's dust save his own was good. Drinks were not to be purchased. Every saloon ran open, with extra relays of exhausted bartenders, and the drinks were given away. A man who refused this hospitality, and persisted in paying, found a dozen fights on his hands. The veriest chechaquos rose up to defend the name of Daylight from such insult. And through it all, on moccasined feet, moved Daylight, hell-roaring Burning Daylight, overspilling with good nature and camaraderie, howling his he-wolf howl and claiming the night as his, bending men's arms down on the bars, performing feats of strength, his bronzed face flushed with drink, his black eyes flashing, clad in overalls and blanket coat, his ear-flaps dangling and his gauntleted mittens swinging from the cord across the shoulders. But this time it was neither an ante nor a stake that he threw away, but a mere marker in the game that he who held so many markers would not miss.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

AS IT SOMETIMES HAPPENS.

The man at the corner of the down town alley was selling some kind of cement.

It was worth 25 cents a bottle, as he explained to his hearers, but in order to introduce it he was making a special price of one dime, good for this particular occasion only, and he guaranteed satisfaction or money refunded.

"Will it mend broken china?" inquired a lean, undersized man in the crowd.

"It will mend anything but a broken promise or a ruined character. Say, my friend, here's a couple of sticks of wood, fastened together at the ends. If you break them apart I'll make you a present of a bottle."

Carelessly the undersized man took the joined sticks in his hands.

Then he gave them a sudden, violent wrench.

But they didn't break apart.

It is saddening to have to spoil a story in this manner, but sometimes in the interests of historical accuracy it has to be done.

Dire Necessity.

"Yes, sir, in a year from now this Amalgamated Balloon stock will be worth $10,000 and I'll sell it to you for 50 cents."

"If it'll be worth $10,000 in a year from now, why don't you keep it yourself?"

"Well, you see, I need a shave and a hair cut, and I'd be a holy show if I waited that long."—Judge.

WOMEN'S LEAP YEAR RIGHTS

In Scotland Years Ago They Were Recognized as Real, and Well Defined by Law.

Ancient, indeed, are the prerogatives that are accorded to women in leap year. They are so old that none can tell just how or when they originated. However, the ancient Scottish parliament gives us a date as well as a law upon which to hang the right of women to take the initiative in leap year, as convention forbids them to do in other years.

In the year 1228 this body passed a law which, in its quaint old English, expressly conferred on womankind the right to propose marriage in leap year. Here is the law, just as it was written in the parliamentary records:

"Ordonit that during ye reign of her maist blessed Maiestie, ilka maiden, ladee of baith high and lowe estait, shale hae libertie to speak ye man she likes. Gif he refuses to tak hir to bee his wyf, he shale be mulct in ye sum of ane hundridty pundes, or less, as his estait may bee, except and alwais gif he can make it appeare that he is betrothit to another women, then he shale be free."

HANDS WOULD CRACK OPEN

"About two months ago my hands started to crack open and bleed, the skin would scale off, and the good flesh would burn and itch dreadfully. When my hands first started to get sore, there were small blisters like water blisters which formed. They itched dreadfully, it just seemed as though I could tear the skin off. I would scratch them and the skin would peel off, and the flesh would be all red and crack open and bleed. It worried me very much, as I had never had anything the matter with my skin. I was so afraid I would have to give up my employment.

"My doctor said he didn't think it would amount to anything. But it kept getting worse. One day I saw a piece in one of the papers about a lady who had the same trouble with her hands. She had used Cuticura Soap and Ointment and was cured. I decided to try them, and my hands were all healed before I had used one cake of Cuticura Ointment. I am truly thankful for the good results from the Cuticura Soap and Ointment, for thanks to them I was cured, and did not have to lose a day from work. I have had no return of the skin trouble." (Signed) Mrs. Mary E. Breig, 2522 Brown Street, Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 12, 1911.

Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura." Dept. L, Boston.

WHERE DOCTORS FAILED TO HELP

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Restored Mrs. Green's Health—Her Own Statement.

Covington, Mo.—"Your medicine has done me more good than all the doctor's medicines. At every monthly period I had to stay in bed four days because of hemorrhages, and my back was so weak I could hardly walk. I have been taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and now I can stay up and do my work. I think it is the best medicine on earth for women."—Mrs. JENNIE GREEN, Covington, Mo.

How Mrs. Cline Avoided Operation.

Brownsville, Ind.—"I can say that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done me more good than anything else. One doctor said I must be operated upon for a serious female trouble and that nothing could help me but an operation.

"I had hemorrhages and at times could not get any medicine to stop them. I got in such a weak condition that I would have died if I had not got relief soon.

"Several women who had taken your Compound, told me to try it and I did and found it to be the right medicine to build up the system and overcome female troubles.

"I am now in great deal better health than I ever expected to be, so I think I ought to thank you for it."—Mrs. O. M. CLINE, S. Main St., Brownsville, Ind.

BOTTLE IS NON-REFILLABLE

Invention is Designed to Prevent Refilling of Vessel After It Has Once Been Filled.

In describing a non-refillable bottle designed by W. W. Clark of Panama, the Scientific American says:

In this invention the design is to prevent the refilling of the vessel after the original contents have been decanted. The purpose of the improvement is to provide novel features of construction for a device which will positively seal the bottle against applied pressure in case an attempt is made to refill the same by use of a force pump. The bottle is designed to receive and hold liquids of any density. The illustration herewith represents a longitudinal sectional view showing the bottle emptied and parts adjusted to seal the inlet to the bottle against the introduction of liquid.

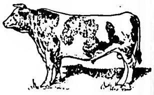
HOLSTEIN COW GIVES MOST

For Cheap Milk Production This Breed Surpasses—It Is Not as Rich in Butter Fat.

Can a Holstein cow produce a quart of milk cheaper than a cow of any other breed? It can. But how?

A Holstein cow is a big beast, weighing from 1,200 to 1,400 pounds. It has a large capacity for feed. This natural fitness to eat enormous quantities of feed means a large production of milk. A cow is a factory for the production of milk. Like any other factory, the larger the amount of product turned out, the cheaper it is produced.

A Holstein cow may be likened to the larger factory. The expense of keeping a cow before a pound of milk is produced isn't much more for a large cow than a small one.



Champion Holstein Bull.

This ability to turn out large quantities of milk belongs to a Holstein, and it is due to their size and capacity for feed resulting from their size.

While a quart of Holstein milk is produced cheaper than the same quantity of milk produced by any other breed, it isn't as rich in butter fat. Holstein milk averages three per cent. or a little more. The other dairy breeds average higher than this, but don't give as much milk.

Incomplete Milking Bad.

Incomplete milking not only robs the dairyman of the richest portion of the milk, the strippings, but it damages the cow, tending to lessen her daily production and to shorten the period of lactation. It takes a little more time to draw the last pint of milk from the udder, but the time is well spent in view of the gain both to the cow and to its owner.

Autumn Calves.

According to some experiments made in Ireland, calves born in the autumn made faster gains during the winter when housed at night in a well-ventilated shed than did calves which received no shelter, but by midsummer there was little difference in the two lots. Wet weather had a more injurious effect on the unprotected cattle than did a protracted cold spell.

Good and Poor Cows.

The practice of getting rid of the poorest cows and putting good ones in their places looks mighty expensive, but it is not so expensive as keeping them in the herd to drag down the profits of the better ones.

TO PRODUCE CERTIFIED MILK

Barnyard Should Be Free From Manure and Well Drained—Cleanliness Must Be Observed.

(By C. B. LANE.)

For the production of certified milk, the barnyard should be free from manure and well drained, so that it may not harbor stagnant water. The manure which collects each day should not be piled close to the barn, but should be taken several hundred feet away.

If these rules are observed not only will the barnyard be free from objectionable smell, which is an injury to the milk, but the number of flies in summer will be considerably diminished.

In the stable cleanliness must be strictly observed. The stables should be well ventilated, lighted and drained and should have tight floors, preferably of cement, never of dirt.

They should be whitewashed inside at least twice a year, unless the walls are painted or of smooth cement finish which can be washed frequently.

The air should always be fresh and without bad odor. A sufficient number of lanterns should be provided to enable the necessary work to be properly done during the dark hours.

The manure should be removed twice daily, except when the cows are outside in the fields the entire time between the morning and afternoon milkings. The manure gutter must be kept in a sanitary condition.

All sweeping must be finished before the grooming of the cows begins, so that the air may be free from dust at the time of milking.

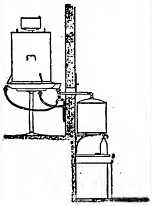
Remove the milk from each cow from the stable immediately after it is obtained to a clean room and strain through a sterilized strainer of cheesecloth and absorbent cotton.

The rapid cooling is a matter of great importance. The milk should be cooled to 45 degrees F. within an hour and not allowed to rise above that as long as it is in the hands of producer or dealer.

In order to assist in the rapid cooling, the bottles should be cold before the milk is put into them.

All utensils should be as simple in construction as possible, and so made that they may be thoroughly sterilized before each using.

Coolers, if used, should be sterilized in a closed sterilizer, unless a very high temperature can be obtained by the steam sent through them.



Cooler and Bottling Machinery.

Bottling machines should be made entirely of metal with no rubber about them, and should be sterilized in the closed sterilizer before each milking, or bottling.

Bottles should be of the kind known as "common sense," and capped with a sterilized paraffined paper disk and the caps authorized by the commission.

All dairy utensils, including the bottles, must be thoroughly cleansed and sterilized.

DAIRY NOTES

Expand your feed supply with a silo.

Economy in feeding the dairy cow never pinches the ration.

The silo lends itself admirably to efforts at intensive farming.

Oil meal or cottonseed meal and ensilage is practically as good.

Nothing is better than corn meal to holster up the calves' skim milk.

Alfalfa and ensilage make a nearly perfect ration. Corn and ensilage is fine.

Skim milk is less digestible than whole milk. The safety lies in light feeding.

Handling eggs has been found an ideal side line for the creamery when properly regulated.

Practically all cases of difficult churning can be readily overcome by methods of handling.

Nothing ever came so near turning December into June for dairy cattle and sheep as the silo.

Plenty of hot water must be used in keeping the dairy utensils clean during the hot weather.

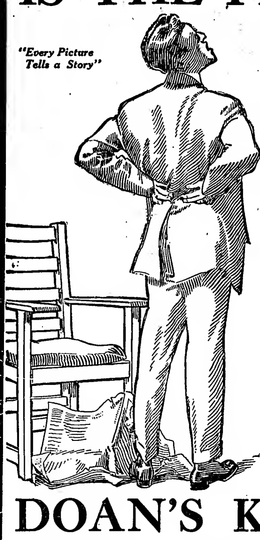
Impatience with the heifer that is freshening for the first time is one sure way of spoiling the cow.

The length of the stall should be adjusted by the size of the cow, and always used by the same cow.

Cans used for shipping sweet cream must be perfectly clean if a fine quality of cream is to be furnished.

Probably the most prolific source of milk contamination, as far as numbers are concerned, is the milk utensils.

One way to save feed bills is to protect the cows from flies during the summer and the cold weather in the winter.



"Every Picture Tells a Story"

IS THE PAIN THERE?

Then Your Kidneys May Be Weak and in Need of Quick Attention

Backache is enough cause to suspect the kidneys. The kidneys are in the small of the back. Congested kidneys swell and throb. The back naturally aches. It hurts to bend or stoop or to sit down.

Kidney trouble may come on all unnoticed. A cold, a chill, a fever, a strain or irregular habits may start it. While sick kidneys can be cured in the beginning, it is a serious matter when dropsy, gravel or Bright's disease sets in.

Doan's Kidney Pills have made a reputation in the cure of backache, and kidney and bladder ills. The best proof is the testimony of the users. Here are two typical testimonials. Thirty thousand others are being published in the newspapers. A postage stamp will bring you reports of cases nearer home.

If you suspect your kidneys, get the best-recommended kidney remedy.

MRS. MARY I. REMINGTON.

A Resident of Gilroy, Cal.

Cured of Serious Case at a Critical Period.

"I suffered so severely from pain and soreness over my kidneys," says Mrs. Remington, "that it was a task for me to turn in bed. My kidneys acted very freely but secretions were retarded and scalded in passage. I was weak and much run down.

"After taking other remedies without benefit, I began using Doan's Kidney Pills and was completely cured. I was going through the critical period of a woman's life at the time, and after using Doan's Kidney Pills there was a miraculous change for the better in my health."

SHELDON SMITH.

Prop. Arlington House, Woodland, Cal.

Cured of Serious Case and Feels Like a Boy, Despite His 76 Years.

"Three years ago I was almost helpless," said Mr. Smith, "Kidney secretions scalded terribly and obliged me to arise ten to twelve times a night. My left limb became so stiff and sore I could hardly walk—just hobbled around with a cane.

"I had almost every complaint that diseased kidneys produce and Doan's Kidney Pills cured them all. At the age of 76 I feel like a boy, and enjoy health and comfort. Can anyone wonder at my gratitude?"

Senator Bankhead, discussing an eloquent speech that had been rather poorly reported, said:

"The report spoiled the speech. It was like old Hiram Earwig's account of Daniel Webster's last words. Webster, you know, as he lay dying, uttered the profound and significant sentence, 'I still live.' Well, Hiram Earwig of Skeeter Beach said to a visitor from the city:

"Yawp, life's onsartin. Wot wuz it that thar New Englander said—Webster, I think? Yawp, it wuz General Dan Webster. He got off a good thing just afore he died. He riz up in bed an' says, says he:

SPY'S DARING ESCAPE from GERMAN PRISON

OUTRANKING the real adventures of Latude, the famous prisoner of the Bastile, or the fictitious escapades of the count of Monte Cristo, was the sensational escape from the German citadel at Glatz of Captain Lux, a French officer who was serving a term of six years imprisonment on a charge of espionage. How Captain Lux outdid these two heroes of fact and fiction is best seen from his own simple account of his flight.

"In all the six months I was at Glatz," he said, "I never got a glimpse of my prison from the outside. I was constantly and closely guarded. All day long I was rigorously constrained to keep my room save that from 10 a. m. till noon and from 2:15 till 4:15 I was suffered to walk about the interior of the fortress and talk to my fellow-prisoners, while for an hour morning and evening an officer took me for a walk on the rampart to enjoy the fresh air blowing on the height.

"Well, I was bored, and I wrote to this effect to my people who communicated with my excellent friends. Never shall I forget the warm thrill I had when I got the first communication telling me that my friends were busy on my behalf.

"The surveillance was very strict. All my letters were opened and read, those I received as well as those I wrote. My books and newspapers were likewise opened and anything of a seditious nature was taken away. Often when my luncheon or dinner arrived I found the rolls had been cut into slices in case they might contain a file, and on some occasions even the fruit was sectioned by way of precaution.

"My friends had therefore to communicate with me in secret, and this they accomplished by the old trick of invisible ink. I used to have my letters handed to me with the seal of the envelope open, and the letters themselves contained nothing calculated to arouse alarm.

"But as soon as my warden had left me I used to ungum carefully the flaps of the envelope and hold the inner side to the bars of the great white-tiled stove standing in the room. Then as the paper crackled and contracted a line or two of writing would appear telling me how the plan progressed and what my part was to be.

"I, too, was able to communicate with my friends in this way, but how I managed it is still a secret. I let them know that what I must have above all things else was money and some tools for removing certain obstacles I had noted as being likely to impede my progress when the moment of my escape arrived. Once out of my cell, I should have to open two locked doors and then get through a window protected by a stout iron bar solidly wedged in masonry.

"From the window there was a drop which was not too dangerous to jump, perhaps, but the noise I should have made in alighting on the flagged courtyard beneath would certainly have been heard by the sentries, so I had to have material to make a rope ladder.

"All these observations I passed on to my devoted friends, very discreetly and at rare intervals.

"Every day I received from Paris a large parcel of newspapers and magazines. These were opened in the governor's quarters and then sent in to me after they had been roughly tied up again with the cord fastening them. It was this cord which attracted my attention. It was not the ordinary scrap or end of string with which such rolls of newspapers are generally fastened, but nice, new string, evidently taken off a fresh ball. I examined it carefully and my heart gave a great leap. The cord was waxed!

"Every day brought its packet of papers or reviews wound up with the same strong twine, and one day I found under the flap of an envelope a bill just a line to this effect, 'Gardez ficelle!' (Keep string.)

"The next indication I had was the word 'Reliure,' (binding), which had been written in invisible ink in the envelope of a letter from home. Ever since my arrival at Glatz I had received parcels of books from Paris once or twice a week, and this single word at once suggested to me what was meant. My books were to bring me something, too.

"One, two, three days passed, and on the fourth my warder brought me a box of books. There were several mathematical treatises, for being in the engineers, mathematics have always been a strong point with me, some yellow paper-bound novels, and two or three ponderous tomes of history.

"They were Frederic Masson's works on the great Napoleon, a favorite hobby of mine. There was 'Josephine Impératrice et Reine' and 'Josephine Repudiee' and one or two others. With my penknife I slit open the backs of the paper-bound novels—nothing! Then the mathematical books—same result! Masson on the Empress Josephine—also nothing! What did it mean?

"Then as I put 'Josephine Repudiee' disconsolately back on the table something jingled on the floor. I stooped and picked it up. It was a German mark. I seized the book again and there emerging from the cover near where my penknife had made its first incision I saw the edge of another silver piece protruding.

"Frantically I tore the cover off and behold, between the outer and inner covering were twenty marks in silver. Looking again at the other Masson volume I found gummed between two sheets of cardboard two exquisitely finished files, made of the finest steel and shaped flat so as to fit exactly in the space between the coverings of the book.

"After that my reputation as a student was established in the citadel of Glatz. Every moment I could spare from my reconnoitering walks I spent at my table, poring over the books which now arrived regularly every five or six days.

"In order to allay suspicion I applied for gum and brushes and amused myself by binding nearly all the paper books in my little prison library in clean blue paper so that my operations with the penknife on the weekly consignments of books might give the impression that I was merely preparing them for rebinding.

"The authorities were quite touched by the solicitude of my family. "'What a good friend your brother is to you,' a German prisoner said to me one day on hearing I had received a present of a splendid box of chalks. He little knew that these colored pencils contained not chalk, but each a precious implement to help me in my escape. I had a Sandow exerciser sent me one day. One of the grips was destined, I knew, to form the handle of a saw which was contained in one of my chalks, the saw itself fitting into a harmless-looking ruler which my thoughtful brother had sent to me to assist me in my mathematical calculations.

"Then there was the beautiful bath towel, a great big one, made of the solidest linen fibre. The authorities thought this was for use after my daily tub. In reality I had to warn my friends that the parcel cord was hardly enough for my purpose and I might have to supplement it.

"Just before Christmas I received a reasonable present from an old schoolfellow of mine in the shape of a calendar. How I longed for its arrival, for I had been warned that it would contain a German general staff map of the environs of Glatz showing the way to the Austrian frontier, which was only twelve miles distant.

"We had determined that the best time for the attempt would be Christmas, when discipline was rather relaxed at the citadel and many of the prisoners away on parole.

"But I was not certain what day I could best slip away, so, in the event of not being able to depend on the friendly automobile, I had supplied myself with a complete disguise. Pleading the wet weather, I had obtained permission for a mackintosh to be sent up to the citadel from the town on the grounds that whether it rained or not I could not forego my daily walk on the ramparts. I also got a gray alpaca cap of the kind that German men are in the habit of donning when in railroad cars. With a pair of gold-rimmed spectacles, which I had already, my disguise was complete.

"On the morning of Christmas eve I knew that everything was ready. I had learned that the fortress authorities were giving a Christmas tree to the military warders in the afternoon, and this was the moment I had chosen for my attempt.

"I came in from my walk at 4:15, as usual, and presently I heard the distant echo of footsteps as the prison staff trooped along the passages to the room where the Christmas party was being held.

"With my mackintosh over my arm concealing my rope ladder, my saw and files in my pocket, and my money in my purse, I gently opened the door of my cell. Not a sound. The time had come.

"I came to the door at the end of the passage and picked the lock in a hand's shake. I knew that yet another door was before me before I got to my window and that the lock might give me more trouble. It did, and I had to work hard to get that door open. I was perspiring freely as I passed through it and came beneath the window giving access to the fortress garden, which had yet to be traversed.

"One's troubles only begin with a file, and more than once while engaged on that solid iron bar I despaired of overcoming this obstacle. For four mortal hours I sawed away, the perspiration pouring down my face. I had to stop every minute to listen if any one were coming, but all remained still.

"When I look back on those four hours behind that grated window I don't know how I held out, and I can hardly recall how I got through and let myself down the sixteen feet separating me from the ground. All I know is that I left a stump of bar on which I had fixed my ladder, and a minute later I sprang noiselessly to earth.

"Here I found myself in some gardens which I crossed stealthily. I knew what was to come. My objective was a high iron gate surmounted by a gas lamp, where I knew a sentry would be posted. Once past this danger point and I was free—of the citadel at least. For the gate gave on to the roadway.

"Stealing cautiously over the ground and picking my way I came to the high fortress wall. Step by step I sidled along that wall until I reached the gate. I scaled it and looking over the top saw in the road immediately beneath me the spike of the sentry's helmet flashing in the rays of the gas lamp.

"If the man had been prompted to look up he would have seen me in that instant and I should have been lost. But he was just on the turn. With his great-coat collar turned up to his ears and his rifle firmly grasped in his mittened hand he turned and tramped, stamping, back to his sentry box, which he passed and then returned in my direction.

"I ducked my head. When he turned his back on me again I would make a dash for it. From behind the gate I heard the heavy tramp cease an instant and then recommence. Then I raised my head. I was full in the glare of the lamp. It was now or never, so getting both legs over the top of the gate I let myself fall lightly to earth.

"I found myself within a few yards of the sentry and opposite a kind of timber shelter on the other side of the road. In a moment the sentry would turn again, so I leaped on tiptoe like a flash for the shelter. After waiting a few seconds I walked boldly out, disregarding the sentry, down the road to the station."

This is where Captain Lux's story ends. He will say no more for fear of causing unpleasantness to any one of those who helped him in his marvelous escape.

This extraordinary Monte Cristo up to date just walked into the station of Glatz and boarded the Austrian express. When the conductor came for the tickets the muffled-up German gentleman with the gold-rimmed glasses and the green overcoat explained he had run a little short of money, but would pay his ticket to the frontier station of Mittelwalde in Austria. Here he was handed over to the stationmaster, to whom he frankly explained his case, revealing his identity with a calmness which stupefied that gold-laced functionary.

Very politely the captain asked for permission to use the station telegraph to wire his friends in Budapest for money. Permission was granted, for, as a political prisoner, the captain was immune from extradition proceedings, and in a few hours the money was forthcoming for the captain by telegraph. And then, a free man once more, he took train for Paris, having wired his friends the news of his successful escape by means of a telegram signed "Karl Noel."

Successful Singer Asserts She Will Build Theater to Help the Struggling Musician.

Undiscovered genius is no longer to sit and eat its heart out in some poor garret of the Latin Quarter. Yvette Guilbert, she of the long gloves, the Titian locks and the big heart, is to build a theater for his especial benefit. For many years she has taken an interest in the long-haired genius of several professions and she now hopes to give the great unacted and unheard a chance to exhibit their stunts before an appreciative public without the interference of a coldly commercial manager.

"I am going to have a little hall all my own," she said to me. "I am concerned most of all for the poor unknown composers and musicians, who have a truly hard time of it in present conditions. I will have a tiny orchestra of selected musicians which will give the works of men and women who are at present appreciated only by the intellectual. With the profits I am sure I will make I will build a Maison des Artistes, similar to institutions to be found in almost every celebrations will be held there There great artists of every kind, when they visit Paris, the world's center of arts, can be feted and entertained in a proper way. Musical and literary celebrations will be held there and it will serve as a meeting place for all who are interested in the arts."

Guilbert is still a wonderfully young looking woman. She is one of the easiest of French celebrities to reach and certainly one of the pleasantest to interview.

BIRTHPLACE OF GREAT MAN

House in Which Pasteur Was Born Is to Be Preserved as a Memorial.

Mr. Rockefeller's subscription of $1,000 to the fund which is being raised to purchase and maintain the little house at Dole, in the Jura department where Pasteur was born, has aroused a feeling of humiliation in France, which is thus placed in the position of allowing a foreigner to supply the money necessary to honor one of her great men.

Pasteur's father was a soldier in the army of the Great Napoleon and was 25 when he retired to his native country after the collapse of the empire, and earned a living as a tanner. Pasteur has written of his parents:

"Oh! father and mother! My beloved departed, who lived so modestly in this little house, it is to you that I owe everything! Your enthusiasm, my brave mother, you impressed upon me. If I have ever and always associated the greatness of science with the greatness of my country it is because I was impregnated with sentiments inspired by you. And you, dear father, whose life was as hard as your own hard occupation, you showed me what patience in long efforts can achieve. It is to you I owe my tenacity in daily work."

The subscription toward the purchase of the house has not been closed. Mr. Rockefeller's suggestion that it should remain open having been acted upon, several foreign universities and many communes and villages have sent subscriptions to the mayor of Dole.

Meant to Rout the "Hants"

Why Looking Glasses Are So Generally Placed on Graves in South by Colored People.

It would be very difficult at this late day to discover anything new in the way of negro superstitions, but one has been unearthed in Raleigh, N. C., which may or may have not have wide prevalence, according to the New York Herald. A negro graveyard—for they do not use the word cemetery at all—is often a strange sort of place. There is something barbaric about it. In a cemetery there a great many of the graves are covered with bright objects, and in one case, where a man died of consumption, the earth mound is almost covered with triangular bottles, which once contained medicine, bits of looking glass being set here and there, so that the effect is really dazzling.

In another case a grave is covered with broken bits of looking-glass of all sorts and shapes, and it is this particular grave which developed the fact of the superstition. An aged negro was met very near it, and conversation began, taking quite a range. There was some discussion of "hants" and a story is told regarding the appearance of one of these specters in the suburbs of Raleigh, an aged negress declaring that a little before dusk she had seen the "hant." Here is what she told about it:

"I wuz standin' in my poach when I seed er sort uv twinkle in da element (meaning the sky) and right dar and den ar hant drapped. He flung hisself all erbout on er little grass mound 'side an ole walf what ain't got no top, tuk off his haid, put it under one arm and den jump't over a road into er graveyard. He didn't go by er place what a whole lot of horseshoes is nailed up on er house do.' Hants an' no other kind or sperets kin stan' horseshoes."

The old darky listened to this story very intently; his eyes rolled and he said: "Bless Gawd!" several times. Then he looked about and said: "Niggers shorely is feared uv hants. Dat's why dey puts lookin' glasses on dese here graves. Er hant cums erlong; er floatin', and when he sees hisself in dem glasses he goes on. He thinks dat er bigger hant dan he is er guardin' ginst him."

Try to Make Each Day Count.

"Why do so many fail in life? Because they don't make each day count. Many a man who may be full of hope and ambition for the future fails to see this point. He doesn't realize that success depends upon persistency. Each day lost is a setback, a pearl dropped from the necklace. He loses or wastes a day, then another. Soon the number of lost days increases, and before long he finds himself slipping backward. Before he knows it he is out of a position which might have given him a great future if he had taken care of it. Take care of the days and the weeks, months and years will take care of themselves."—Monroe E. Phillips.

Avoiding Writer's Cramp.

Shuangh chi'u-er, although the name may sound like a disease, is not a form of writer's cramp. On the contrary, "their" purpose is to prevent it. The words mean "the double balls," and shuangh chi'u-er are two iron balls, an inch or so in diameter, which nestle in the right hand of every Chinese man of letters for hours each day, one being revolved about the other until they are worn bright. They are just large enough to make a handful, and the action of shifting one about the other brings the fingers into play and lends them that suppleness and digital dexterity which is necessary in the manipulation of the Chinese lettering-pen or fine-pointed brush. Of what a simplicity!—Atlantic.

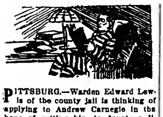
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

New Plan for Classifying Prisoners



PITTSBURG.—Warden Edward Lewis of the county jail is thinking of applying to Andrew Carnegie in the hope of getting him to donate a library filled with literary classics in order to supply brain food for a number of real "high brows" now in confinement. The prison library has been found absolutely insufficient to supply the requirements of these highly intellectual prisoners, and the prize for having such a select body must now come to this city, instead of to the historic old Charlestown jail of cultured and astute Boston, which has hitherto held the honor over all the cities of the country.

"A city or county jail is about the last place in the world," said Deputy Warden John McNeil, "that anyone would seek for a batch of the real, simon pure intellectual giants known as 'high brows,' but we have a collection that is a wonder. The literary talent and linguistic power of some of these prisoners is simply marvelous, and the strange part of it is how men of such profound knowledge are not otherwise brainy enough to keep out of jail. If the average receipt of such prisoners is maintained it will be a strong argument for the 'low brows'' side, of whom we have a big population."

All told, there are a score of prisoners now doing time in the prison who are able to converse fluently in half a dozen languages.

As convincing proof of this, a prisoner of Polish birth was brought out to converse with an attache of the district attorney's office. The latter is somewhat of a linguist and boasts of being able to converse in 12 different languages. The prisoner, who was formerly engaged as a foreign banker, just went the young attorney three better. He demonstrated to the listeners that he was as familiar with 15 different tongues as he is with his native chatter. There are others in jail equally fluent, too.

All of these prisoners demand high-class literature to peruse in their idle moments.

Times Are Bad for Steamship Barbers

NEW YORK.—Barbers on Atlantic liners are now complaining about safety razors, which have reduced their profits to such an extent that they have been compelled to eke out a living by selling all kinds of notions, from Bibles to chewing gum. In the palmy days barbers were inclined to regard with scorn and to keep waiting the passenger who shaved himself and only came to the shop for a hair cut. On the White Star line the daily rush for shaves among first cabin passengers was recognized by the company, and one of its rules, 403, section 8, read:

"Barbers of the White Star steamships are not allowed to cut passengers' hair before noon."

All morning the barbers were kept busy, and in the afternoon from 4 o'clock until dinner time, scraping the chins of passengers who would not take a chance of cutting themselves with the old-fashioned razors as the ship pitched up and down or rolled from side to side.

Now many passengers shave themselves, whether it is rough or smooth, and never patronize the barber's shop unless the ship is over toward her beam ends, which is the time the barber doesn't want to shave any one.

Owing to this decline of business the steamship companies have had to reduce the rents charged for the barbers' shops on their liners, and in some cases they have had to pay as much as $40 a month to get the professors of the tonsorial art to go to sea. Rene de Sans Souci, one of the most dignified sea-going barbers, said:

"Yees, it ees verre sad, triste, eh, for ze artiste of ze cheveux to the sea in hig sheeps for many doys without moking the razor on face to go. I am desole hecause for the rent and my expensee."

Sam Skeggs, another roving barber, well known from the Hudson to the Yukon, said that the barber business on board ship since the advent of the safety razor gave him the fantods.

Veteran and Bride Face Want for Love

KANSAS CITY.—Expelled from the Confederate Home at Higginsville because they became engaged and were married several weeks ago, Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Starns, both past 70 years old, came to try their future in Kansas City the other morning. The aged couple had just 15 cents when they arrived at the court house to apply for admission to the county home. Two small telescope suitcases contained all their worldly goods.

Mr. Starns told fondly about the romance of a few weeks and the courtship "on the sly" in the Confederate Home.

"You know, I was in Senator Cockrell's brigade and saw hard service in Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia during the four years of the Civil war," Mr. Starns said. "I went to the Confederate Home eight years ago from Jackson county. There I met W. B. Ellis, my wife's first husband. He died two years ago and his widow continued a resident of the home. She became ill five months ago and I was assigned to wait on her.

"Well, we just got to talking to each other and decided that if younger folks could get married there wasn't any crime for older ones to do the same."

The bride and groom were assigned to a room at the county home. Mrs. Starns has lived in Jackson county more than forty years. Mr. Starns has been a resident of Missouri 70 years.

"Mammy" Takes Son's Garb to Prison

ATLANTA, Ga.—"Dis bare'a fer my boy. I hear he's gwine out to de gang ergin," said an old negro mammy the other day at the grill door of the Tower.

She carried an old basket made of "splits," which she handed Deputy Sheriff John Suttles as he opened the door. It was covered with a newspaper, neatly folded.

"Why, what's this?" asked the jailer in surprise as he saw inside a suit of baggy clothes, alternately striped with broad bands of black and white, the uniform of a Georgia convict.

"It's his suit," she explained. "You see, hit's dis way: Dat boy allus was overgrown for his age, an' when he fust went out to de roads he was pow'ful uncomf'table 'cause de clo'es what he had warn't like what his mammy used ter make. Dey was all skimpy in the waist, and de pants was tight. Why, he said he jes had ter pull an' tug every time he put 'em on, and he shirts ain't had no tails at all.

"Den when dey wore out, you see, a speshul suit was made, what fitted him perzactly. After dat he didn't min' so much de work, an' when his time was out dey let him bring it home. Dat's dem. He'll want 'em ergin, I'm sho, an' his ol' mammy will be satersfied about him."

"When was he arrested and what's his name?"

"What's his name? Oh, Julius Willyums. I ain't knowin' when he was 'rested, but I aint' seen him in er month, so I knows he's in jail. I wants him ter be fixed up right when he goes out. You'll give 'em to him?"

The promise was made on the spot and the old woman left "satersfied."

PROMINENT PEOPLE

SELECTED FOR SUPREME COURT

The nomination of Mahlon Pitney, chancellor of the state of New Jersey, to be an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, was sent to the senate the other day by President Taft. He will succeed the late John M. Harlan of Kentucky.

The president also nominated Julius M. Meyer of New York city to be judge of the United States district court for southern New York, and Ferdinand A. Geiger of Cassville, Wis., to be district judge for the eastern district of Wisconsin.

The statement that Chancellor Pitney would be named as the successor of Justice John M. Harlan was made at the White House subsequent to a call by John W. Griggs, former attorney-general of the United States, and a delegation of New Jersey lawyers, all of whom spoke of Judge Pitney in the highest terms.

The fact that Mr. Taft would likely select Chancellor Pitney for the Supreme Court vacancy came as a surprise, and did not become known until the night previous to the nomination, and then it was discussed only among some of the president's closest friends. Unusual efforts were made to guard the secret.

Judge Pitney has already made a name for himself in state and national politics as congressman and president of the New Jersey state senate.

HELPS COOK AND SERVE MEAL

Girls employed in the Outlook offices held their heads high the other day and regarded with a somewhat superior air the other girls in the same building in New York. No less a personage than Miss Ethel Roosevelt took luncheon with them in their combined dining room and kitchen on the second floor.

Miss Roosevelt not only said she enjoyed the luncheon, but she also had a lot of fun waiting on herself and helping to cook things of the gas stoves. She was no stranger to the 75 Outlook girls. She attended their Christmas party, and she knows most of them by their first names.

Miss Roosevelt did not say what time she would arrive. Thirty-five of the girls have their luncheon at 12 o'clock and the others at 1. The Outlook company furnishes sugar, milk, butter, tea and coffee, and also the room and stoves, as well as "Irish Mary," who takes care of the room and washes the dishes. The girls go out to markets and grocery stores to buy their food, then bring it back and cook it themselves.

KING GEORGE MAY VISIT U. S.

That the plan to have King George visit the United States this year or next will be submitted to him soon seems assured, though in official circles not a word is being said aloud on the subject.

There is a feeling in court and political circles that such a visit, if practicable, would present many very desirable features. But there are many difficulties in the way, not insuperable, but presenting for the diplomats and the statesmen a task that they regard as prodigious.

As is understood here, the plan would contemplate a visit by both king and queen to Washington, just as, according to ancient usage, the newly crowned sovereigns are required to pay their respects to the rulers of the European states. This custom might in effect be described as the returning of the calls made by the heads of other countries or their representatives upon the king and queen at the time of the coronation. At once a matter of etiquette arises—namely, that should the king and queen make such an after-coronation visit, the president of the United States would be expected to in turn visit London and the other European capitals after his inauguration. Whether such a thing would be approved by the American people is very doubtful, for no president, as such, has ever crossed the Atlantic.

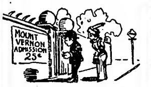
HAS MILLIONS FOR CHARITY

Probably in the history of philanthropy no woman has done more for charity than Mrs. Russell Sage, who, since the death of her noted husband, has been spending millions in the cause of humanity. Most of her work has been accomplished through the Russell Sage Foundation, the scope of which embraces a wide and worthy field. The movements helped by the foundation are as follows: The anti-tuberculosis campaign, the movement for public recreation, the placing out and management of children in institutions, the medical inspection of schools, the propaganda in behalf of children's school gardens, the propaganda for the prevention of blindness, especially among children, and the encouragement and extension of charity organizations.

These are not the only charities that have occupied the attention of Mrs. Sage. She has given large sums to the furtherance of education in this country. The principal universities have each received large endowments and her gifts to the charities of her home city, Syracuse, have been most generous.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

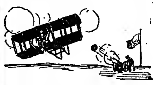
May Do Away With Fee at Mt. Vernon



WASHINGTON.—The legislature of Virginia is now considering the propriety of enacting a law which will do away with a 25-cent admission fee charged at the gate to Mount Vernon, the home of Washington. Earnest protests have been made by many citizens of the state against the charging of any fee for admission to the grounds, on the theory that the public generally, without restraint, ought to be free to enter the grounds and inspect the many interesting things that are to be found there. The legislature of Virginia originally incorporated the ladies' society which owns the Mt. Vernon estate, and has made it what it is today, and of course an amendment of that act, cutting out the admission fee, may be made whenever the legislature in its wisdom sees fit. Two years ago, when the legislature was in session, a similar movement was put under way, but there was not legislation. This time the effort has been renewed with increased enthusiasm, and the no-fee bill is now before the house committee on laws, which has been giving hearings to men and women representing both sides.

The whole country is interested in this proposed change of the articles of incorporation of the ladies' Mt. Vernon society.

U. S. Soon to Have Big Army Air Fleet



WITHIN two years the United States army will probably possess 40 aeroplanes. At present it only has seven machines, a number so insignificant as to make comparison with some of the powers of Europe almost impossible. In the development of the so-called "fourth army" of the military service, this country is far behind France and Germany, notwithstanding the fact that the first men to make practicable the flight of heavier-than-air machines were Americans. Even Italy can show greater advancement than this country, although this is due to the fact that she has on her hands a war which gave her an opportunity to demonstrate the usefulness of the flying-machine in actual service. The only thing approaching that opportunity in this country was offered during the period when we massed troops on the Mexican border.

Notwithstanding the fact that our army may possess 40 aeroplanes inside of two years, we will not even approach France in the number of our "avions," which is the name applied in that country to military flying machines. The French war department proposes to buy during the present year 350 aeroplanes, the minister of finance having asked for $1,000,000 for the extension of aeronautical service. Twenty machines alone were used at the last French military maneuvers. The new machines will be ordered in lots of 20, 50 and even 100. They will be of different types and will be supplied by all the leading French constructors.

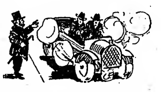
The day has passed when the aeroplane is a mere experiment for military purposes. Only a few days ago an Italian army officer, operating an aeroplane in Tripoli, dropped bombs among the Turks and Arabs and was in return wounded by a rifle bullet. He was using a monoplane and had one passenger with him. The most notable feature of the incident was the fact that he was enabled to continue operation of the machine after he had been wounded. His passenger assisted him and the monoplane was brought back to safety to the Italian camp. Not only were projectiles dropped among the enemy, but the aviator and his companion made sketches of the military works over which they passed.

Creates Furore in Washington Society

THE greatest furore has been created in Washington society by the advent of Mrs. C. H. Anthony of Muncie, Ind., who may or may not be making herself a dummy on which to display the art of millinery and marvelous jewelry. Suffice it to say, the Queen of Sheba would not be one, two, three in the class with Mrs. Anthony as to gorgeousness of raiment and lavishness of gems and jewels. For instance, Mrs. Anthony wears shoes so rackingly costly that she has to put them in the bank vault at night. There is nothing baser in the metal about the person of Mrs. Anthony than gold, and she scorns plain gold, and has it set with jewels to match hat, gown, coat, boas and shoes that she wears them with. Real lace is humiliatingly used to heel her slippers, and her head is topped by $1,000 hats and such like. Her gowns—well, it doesn't take much material to make them, and the least said about them the better. They are of the finest loom and the costliest dyes, and are then overhung with gold and diamonds, turquoise, emeralds, sapphires and pearls. Her coats are the handsomest and her furs the costliest that have ever been seen in the city of Washington. The heels of the wonderful slippers are set with something like diamonds, and she has these of all colors to wear upon the streets. Mrs. Nicholas Longworth is wedded to cut-glass heels on her shoes and slippers, but has never gone so far as cut-glass solitaires. Mrs. Anthony is wedded to what she terms the "gospel of clothes." There is one thing quite certain, and that is, "Lead us not into temptation" finds no place in her gospel decalogue. With all her love for finery Mrs. Anthony is intensely American, and says American clothes are good enough for her, and she has all her dresses made in Indianapolis.

"American clothes are good enough for me," she declares. "Every gown I own was made in Indianapolis."

Speaker Rides in an Automobile Now



WHEN he was elected speaker of the house of representatives Champ Clark refused to accept an automobile to be paid for by the government. Such a provision was made by congress during the term of Speaker Cannon, and that gentleman used his government automobile to his heart's content. He became so enamored of the joy of automobiling that at the end of his term he purchased one of his own and puts it to good use.

While Champ Clark does not own an automobile or allow the government to furnish him one, he enjoys riding, and, strange to say, he enjoys riding with his predecessor, Joseph G. Cannon.

Speaker Clark is seen very often riding about the streets and avenues of Washington in Mr. Cannon's machine. The speaker and the ex-speaker are real good friends.

While Speaker Clark lives almost three miles from the capitol he always walks up in the morning if the weather will permit. He enjoys walking and declares that the exercise is refreshing and puts him in good condition for the long hours that he is held at the speaker's desk.

When the weather will not permit he rides on the street cars, taking his chances with the strap hangers and the corn grinders.

On his way home at midnight from a recent Democratic caucus, Mr. Clark hung by a strap and was jostled by the crowd in a car that was packed to its fullest capacity.

As he neared his home he remarked, "If it hadn't been so late I would have walked. Walking beats this all to death."

FAITHFUL WORK.

The expression, "Faithful work is always of the same size," appeared in a recently published article. It opens a world of thought to those who pause long enough to consider such matters, besides offering a generous share of comfort and encouragement to those who sometimes grow disheartened at the apparent result of their efforts. It is true that the world is not always as appreciative as it might be, but then while the world has a big heart and, as a rule, a kindly disposition, it does not always show its appreciation at the moment, says the Charleston News and Courier. It is just this apparent lack of encouragement that makes us lose heart at times and wonder whether after all it is worth while to do our best. The big things in life seem to take up so much room in the public eye that the smaller and just as worthy matters are crowded out. At least that is the impression which many persons form who see the effects of large efforts, whether they be along constructive, or charitable or educational lines. In a way these effects are spectacular; indeed there is a large proportion of mankind who require brilliant effects to make them display interest in passing events. The quiet, unobtrusive worker intent upon results he accomplishes more than upon the impression he creates is overlooked many times, and after a while the want of attention given him and the lack of encouragement offered him find expression in his attitude of growing discontent towards life.

English contemporaries may be assured that the king will have a cordial welcome should he come to America, but to those who profess to believe that America lost its head, so to speak, in the presence of the king's uncle we beg to say that the visit of the royal Governor of Canada was met with a reception that was dignified, but not excessive, says the New York Herald. The reports that were sent to English papers were nearly all false, and nothing in the duke's reception could in any way be compared with the bootlicking and oily homage that is seen daily in London whenever any member of the royal family appears in public.

Throwing away lighted matches, cigars and cigarettes is now a misdemeanor in New York, and offenders will be prosecuted. The carelessness of this practice, trivial as it is regarded, started one of the biggest fires in the history of the world in this city, and is responsible for the recent tragic fire in New York, in which one of the prices paid was the life of a brave fire chief. Casualties and tragedies so easily prevented amount to crimes, and this is the first step toward treating them as such.

By the expenditure of a million dollars it is planned to arrange matters so that no ship of the American navy will be out of hearing of Washington. By establishing wireless stations in the Canal Zone, at San Francisco, in Hawaii, in Samoa, in the Philippines and at Guam, the fleets would be within range of messages anywhere within the zone of American interests. No naval battle would be fought without Washington's knowing the details at the moment. What an advance since the Spanish war!

A New York butcher has been sent to jail for a particularly mean method of cheating. It was his practice when selling poultry to weigh it with a lead sinker concealed inside, the sinker being provided with a string by which he pulled it out before handing over the bird to the customer. But a sharp customer seized his bird before the butcher took it from the scale to wrap it up, and, seeing the string, pulled it out and found the sinker and "had the law" of the butcher. On investigation other similarly loaded poultry was found in the shop.

At a meeting lately of a fire-protection association it was stated that fire in the United States cost $500 a minute. Also, that the annual life loss was 1,500 people, and that 5,000 are annually injured. This showing is a disgrace to civilization. The vast majority both of life and property loss is preventable, and the big mistake of the age is in treating such loss under the head of accidents.

PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOUTH POLE.

PLANTS NORWAY'S FLAG

Temperature at the Pole on the Day of Discovery Found to Be Only 9.4 Degrees Below Zero Fahrenheit.

Hobart, Tasmania, March 8.—On Feb. 10, 1911, we commenced to work our way toward the southward, from that day to April 11, establishing three depots, which in all contained a quantity of provisions about 3,000 kilos. One thousand six hundred kilos, including 1,100 kilos of seal meat, were cached in 80 degrees, 700 kilos in 81 degrees and 800 kilos in 82 degrees south latitude. As the land marks were to be seen, these depots were marked with flags, seven kilometers on each side in the easterly and westerly directions.

The ground and the state of the barrier were of the best, and specially well adapted to driving with dogs. On February 15, we had traveled about 100 kilometers. The weight of the sledges was 300 kilos, and the number of dogs was six for each sledge. The surface of the barrier was smooth and fine with no sastrugi; the crevices were local and were found dangerous in only two places, for the rest long, smooth undulation. The weather was excellent, calm, or with a light breeze. The lowest temperature on these depot trips was minus 45 Celsius or Centigrade (49 degrees below, Fahrenheit.) On March 4, on our return from the first trip beginning February 15, we found out that the Fram had already left us. With pride and delight we heard that her smart captain had succeeded in sailing her furthest south and there hoisting the colors of his country—a glorious moment for him and his comrades—the furthest north and the furthest south—good old Fram. The highest south latitude attained was 78 degrees 41 minutes.

Winter on the Ice Barrier.

Before the arrival of winter we had 6,000 kilos of seal meat in the depots, enough for ourselves and 110 dogs. Eight dog houses, a combination of tents and snow huts, were built.

Having cared for the dogs the turn came to use our solid little hut. It was almost entirely covered with snow by the middle of April. First we had to get light and air. The Lux lamp, which had a power of 200 standard candles, gave us a brilliant light and kept the temperature up to 20 degrees Celius (58 degrees Fahrenheit) throughout the winter, and our excellent ventilation system gave us all the air we wanted.

In direct communication with the hut and dug-out on the barrier were workshops, packing rooms, cellars for provisions, coal wood, and oil, a plain bath, a steam bath, and observatories. Thus we had everything within doors if the weather should be cold and stormy.

The sun left us April 22 and did not return until four months later. The winter was spent in changing our whole outfit, which on the depot trips was found to be too clumsy and solid for the smooth surface of the barrier. Besides this, as much scientific work as possible was done, and some astonishing meteorology observations were taken.

Open Water all Winter.

There was very little snow, and there was open water close by throughout the winter. For the same reason a higher temperature had been expected, but it remained very low.

In five months there were observed temperatures between minus 50 and 60 degrees Celius (58 and 76 degrees below zero Fahrenheit), the lowest temperature, August 13, being minus 59 degrees Celsius. It was then calm. On August 1 the temperature was minus 58 degrees Celsius, and there were six meters of wind. The mean temperature for the year was minus 26 degrees Celsius (14.8 below zero Fahrenheit).

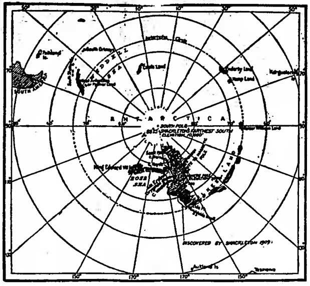
I had expected hurricane after hurricane, but I observed only two moderate storms and many excellent Auroras-Australia in all directions.

The sanitary conditions were of the best all through the winter and when the sun returned, August 24, he got the men sound in mind and body, ready to set about the task that had to be solved.

Already, the day before, we had brought our sledges to the starting place for our march tour of the south. Only in the beginning of September did the temperature rise to such an extent that there was any question of setting out.

First Start for the Pole.

On September 8 eight men, with seven sledges, ninety dogs, and provisions for four months started. The ground was perfect, the temperature not bad. The next day it appeared that we had started too early, as the temperature of the following days fell and kept between minus 50 and 60 Celsius (58 degrees and 76 degrees below Fahrenheit). Personally we did not suffer at all from this cold as our good furs protected us, but with our dogs it was a different matter. It could easily be seen that they shrunk from day to day, and we soon understood that they could not stand the long run to our depot at 80 degrees south.



We agreed to return and wait for the arrival of spring. The provisions were cached, and off we went for the hut. With the exception of the loss of a few dogs and a couple of frozen heels everything was all right.

In the middle of October spring came in earnest. Seals and birds appeared. The temperature was steady between 20 and 30 Celsius (58 degrees and 86 degrees Fahrenheit.

The original plan that all of us should go toward the south had been changed. Five men had to do this work, while the other three were to start for the east and visit King Edward land. This last mentioned trip was not included in our program, but, owing to the fact that the English had not reached it, at least this summer, as was their intention, we all agreed that the best thing to do was to make this trip also.

On October 20 the southern party started five men, four sledges, fifty-two dogs, and provisions for four months, everything in excellent order.

The Journey to the Pole.

We had made up our minds to take the first part of the trip as easily as possible, in order to give ourselves and the dogs a rational training, and on the 23rd we made our depot in 80 degrees south. We went right ahead.

On account of the intense fog an error of two to three kilometers happened once in awhile, but we were caught by the flag marks, and found these on our way without difficulty.

Having rested and fed the dogs on all the salt meat they were able to eat, we started again on the 25th with the temperature steadily between minus 20 and 30 Celsius (4 degrees and 22 degrees below Fahrenheit).

From the start it was the intention not to drive more than 30 kilometers a day, but it appeared that this was little for our strong, willing animals. At 80 degrees south we began to build snow cairns of a man's height in order to have marks on return trip. On the 31st we reached the depot at 81 degrees and stopped there one day and fed the dogs on as much pemmican as they wanted.

We reached the depot at 82 degrees on November 5, where the dogs for the last time got all they wanted to eat. On the 8th, southward again, with a daily march of 50 kilometers.

In order to lighten our heavy sledges we established depots at each degree of south latitude.

Like a Pleasure Trip.

The trip from 82 to 85 degrees became a pleasure trip, excellent ground fine sleighing, and an even temperature. Everything went like a dance. On the 9th we sighted South Victoria Land and the continuation of the mountain range which Sir Ernest Shackleton mentioned in his chart as running toward the southeast from the Beardmire Glacier, and on the same day we reached 83 degrees and established here depot No. 4. On the 11th we made an interesting discovery that the Ross Barrier terminated in a bight toward the southeast at 86 degrees south latitude and 163 degrees west longitude, formed between the southeast mountain range and running to south Victoria land and a range on the opposite side running in a southwesterly direction—probably a continuation of King Edward VII Land.

On the 13th we reached 84 degrees where we established a depot; on the 14th we were at 85 degrees, where, also, we made a depot.

From our winter quarters "Framheim" 78 degrees 38 minutes south latitude, we had been marching due south. On November 17 at 85 degrees, we arrived at a place where the land and barrier were connected. This was done without any great difficulty. The barrier here rises in elevation to about 300 feet, some big crevices on the boundary. Here we made our head depot, taking provisions for sixty days on sledges, and leaving thirty days provisions on the spot.

The land under which we lay and which we now had to attack looked quite imposing. The nearest summit along the barrier had a height from 2,000 to 10,000 feet but several others further south were 15,000 feet or more.

The next day we began the climb. The first part of it was an easy task—light slopes and well filled mountain sides. It did not take a long time, for our willing dogs worked their way up. Further up, we met with some small but very steep glaciers. Here we had to harness 20 dogs to each sledge and take the four sledges in two turns. In some places it was so steep that it was difficult to use our skis.

Some big crevices forced us from time to time to make detours. The first day we climbed 2,000 feet, the next day mostly up some small glaciers, camping at a height of 4,500 feet. The third day we were obliged to go down on a mighty glacier, "Exelhybergs Glacier," which divided the coast mountains from the mountains further south. The next day began the longest part of our climb. Many detours had to be made in order to avoid broad cracks and open crevices. These were apparently mostly filled up, as the glaciers in all probability had long ago stopped moving, but we had to be very careful, never knowing for certain how thick was the layer that covered them.

Our camp that night lay in very picturesque surroundings at a height of 5,000 feet. The glacier here was narrowed in between the two 15,000-feet mountains, the "Fridtj of Nensen" and the "Don Pedro Christopherson." From the bottom of the glacier rose mount "Ole Engistad," a big snow cone 13,500 feet high.

The glacier was very much broken in this comparatively narrow pass. The mighty crevices seemed to stop us from going further but it was not so serious as it appeared. Our dogs, which up to this time had covered a distance of about 7,000 kilometers, the last days hard work, ran this day 35 kilometers, the ascent being 5,500 feet, an almost incredible record. It took us only four days from the barrier to get up on a vast inland plateau.

We camped that night at a height of 10,600 feet. Here we had to kill twenty-four of our brave companions and keep eighteen, six for each of our three sledges.

We stopped here four days on account of bad weather. Tired of this, we set out November 28. On the 26th in a furious blizzard and in a dense snowdrift, absolutely nothing was to be seen but we felt that, contrary to expectations, we were going fast down hill. The hypsometer gave us a fall of 800 feet.

The next day was similar. The weather cleared a little at dinner time and exposed to our view a mighty mountain range to the east, not far off, only for a moment, and then it disappeared in the dense snowdrift. On the 29th it calmed down and the sun shone, though it was not the only pleasant surprise he gave. In our course stretched a big glacier running toward the south. At its eastern end was the mountain range going in a southeasterly direction. Of the western part of it no view was to be had, it being hidden in dense fog.

ROALD AMUNDSEN.

At the foot of this glacier, the "Devil's Glacier," a depot for six days was established; at 86 degrees south latitude the hypsometer indicated 8,000 feet above sea level. On November 30 we began to climb the glacier; the lower part of it was very much broken and dangerous. Moreover, the snow bridges very often burst. From our camp that night we had a splendid view over the mountain to the east. There was "Helmer Hausen's summit," the most remarkable of them all. It was 12,000 feet high and covered with such broken glaciers that in all probability no foothold was to be found. "Oscar Wistings," "Sver Hassels," and "Olav Hjanlands" mountains also lay here beautifully illuminated in the rays of the bright sun.

In the distance, and only alternately to be viewed in the fog, appeared from time to time "Mount Nielsen" with its summits and peaks about 15,000 feet high. We only saw the nearest surroundings. It took us three days to surmount the Devil's Glacier, always in misty weather.

On the 1st of December we left this broken glacier with holes and crevices without number, with its height of 9,100 feet. Before us, looking, in the mist and snowdrifts, like a frozen sea, appeared a light, sloping ice plateau filled with small hummocks.

The walk over this frozen sea was not pleasant. The ground under us was quite hollow and it sounded as though we were walking on the bottoms of empty barrels. As it was, a man fell through, then a couple of dogs. We could not use our skis on this polished ice. Sledges had the best of it.

The place has the name of the "Devil's Dancing Room." This part of our march was the most unpleasant. On December 6th we got our greatest height, according to the hypsometer and aneroid, 10,750 feet, at 87 degrees 4 minutes south. On December 8th we came out of the bad weather. Once again the sun smiled on us. Once again we could get an observation. Dead reckoning and observation were exactly alike—88 degrees 88 minutes 16.6 seconds south.

Before us lay an absolutely plain plateau, only here and there marked with tiny sastrugie.

In the afternoon we passed 88 degrees 23 minutes (Shackleton's furthest south was 88 degrees 25 minutes We camped and established our last depot, No. 10. From 88 degrees 25 minutes the plateau began to slope down very gently and smoothly towards the other side.

On December 9 we reached 86 degrees 39 minutes; on December 10 88 degrees 56 minutes; December 11 89 degrees 15 minutes; December 12 89 degrees 30 minutes; December 13 89 degrees 45 minutes.

Up to this time the observations and dead reckoning agreed remarkably well, and we made out that we ought to be at the pole on December 14 in the afternoon.

That day was a beautiful one, a light breeze from southeast, temperature minus 23 Celsius (9.4 degrees below zero Fahrenheit), and the ground and sledging were perfect. The day went along as usual, and at 3 P. M. we made a halt.

According to our reckoning we had reached our destination. All of us gathered around the colors—a beautiful silk flag—all hands taking hold of it, planting it. The vast plateau on which the pole is standing has the name of "King Haakon VII Plateau." It is a vast plain, alike in all directions; mile after mile during the night we circled around the camp.

In the fine weather we spent the following day taking a series of observations from 6 A. M. to 7 P. M. The result gave us 89 degrees 55 minutes.

In order to observe the pole as closely as possible we traveled, as near south as possible, the remaining 9 kilometers.

On December 16 we camped. It was an excellent opportunity, as there was a brilliant sun. Four of us took observations every hour of the day's twenty-four hours. The exact result will be the matter of a professional private report.

This much is certain—that we observed the pole as closely as it is in human power to do it with the instruments we had—a sextant and an artificial horizon.

On December 17th everything was in order on the spot. We fastened to the ground a little tent we had brought along, a Norwegian flag and the Fram pendant on the top of it. The Norwegian home at the South Pole was called "Polheim." The distance from our winter quarters to the pole was about 1,400 kilometers. The average march a day was 25 kilometers.

We started on the return trip December 17. Usually favorably weather made our way home considerably easier than the journey to the pole. We arrived at our winter quarters, "Framheim," January 25, 1912, with two sledges and eleven dogs, all well.

The daily average speed on the return trip was 36 kilometers; the lowest temperature was minus 31 Celsius (28.8 degrees below zero Fahrenheit), the highest minus 5 degrees Celsius, (23 degrees above zero Fahrenheit).

Among the results are the determination of the extent and character of the Ross Barrier, and the discovery of the connection of South Victoria Land and probably King Edward VII Land, with their continuation in the mighty mountains running toward the southeast, which were observed as far as 88 degrees south, but which in all probability continue across the antarctic continent.

The entire length of the newly discovered mountains is about 850 kilometers. They have been named "Queen Maud's Range."

The expedition to King Edward VII Land under the command of Lieutenant Prestud has given excellent results. Scott's discoveries have been confirmed, and the survey of the Bay of Whales and of the Barrier done by the Prestud party are of great interest. A good geological collection from King Edward VII and South Victoria Land is being brought home.

The Fram arrived at the Bay of Whales January 9. She had been delayed by the "Roaring Forties" on account of the easterly winds.

On January 16 the Japanese expedition arrived at the Bay of Whales and landed on the barrier near our winter quarters. We left the Bay of Whales on January 30. It was a long voyage, with contrary winds. All are well.

Counterfeiter Gets Stiff Sentence.
William Fink, a Brooklyn, N. Y., dealer in drugs, was sentenced by the New York Court of Special Sessions, to imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor, for four months. The charge was counterfeiting the trade-mark for Carter's Little Liver Pills, in violation of the penal law.
The Carter Medicine Company detected the counterfeit before any quantity of the spurious goods had been placed upon the market. In sentencing Fink, Judge Deuel laid special stress upon the injury done to the public when a remedy so well known as Carter's Little Liver Pills is counterfeited and put on the market. He imposed the sentence not only as the proper punishment of Fink himself, but in order to deter others from the commission of like frauds in the future.

His tone was not facetious, but the captive was undismayed.

"—it goes against my stomach!"

Unfortunately, however, the captive was in a locality where there is no market for humor, and the end came soon.

The Very Best Make.

In the course of an after-dinner speech in praise of woman, Samuel Untermeyer, the New York lawyer, said in Pittsburg:

"A commercial traveler remarked the other day to a storekeeper:

"'Make yourself a Christmas present of a cash register. It will keep strict and accurate account of all you receive and all you disburse. It will show what you save and what you squander, what you spend foolishly and what you spend wisely, where you should spread out and where you should retrench, what you waste and how you waste it—'

"'But,' said the storekeeper, 'I've already got a cash register which does all that and more.'

"'Whose make is it?' asked the salesman, frowning.

"'God's make,' the storekeeper replied; and with a smile at once reverent and grateful he nodded toward his handsome wife seated in the cashier's cage."

FROM THE NORTH COUNTRY
Where the Winters Are Cold and the Snows Deep.

Writing from the vicinity David Harum made famous, a man says that he was an habitual coffee drinker, and, although he knew it was doing him harm, was too obstinate to give it up, till all at once he went to pieces with nervousness and insomnia, loss of appetite, weakness, and a generally used-up feeling, which practically unfitted him for his arduous occupation, and kept him on a couch at home when his duty did not call him out.

"While in this condition Grape-Nuts food was suggested to me, and I began to use it. Although it was in the middle of winter, and the thermometer was often below zero, almost my entire living for about six weeks of severe exposure was on Grape-Nuts food with a little bread and butter and a cup of hot water, till I was wise enough to make Postum my table beverage.

"After the first two weeks I began to feel better and during the whole winter I never lost a trip on my mail route, frequently being on the road 7 or 8 hours at a time.

"The constant marvel to me was how a person could do the amount of work and endure the fatigue and hardship as I did, on so small an amount of food. But I found my new rations so perfectly satisfactory that I have continued them—using both Postum and Grape-Nuts at every meal, and often they comprise my entire meal.

"All my nervousness, irritability and insomnia have disappeared and healthy, natural sleep has come back to me. But what has been perhaps the greatest surprise to me is the fact that with the benefit to my general health has come a remarkable improvement in my eye-sight.

"If a good appetite, good digestion, good eye-sight, strong nerves and an active brain are to be desired, I can say from my own experience, use Grape-Nuts and Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

DREADED ATAXIA

What Active Treatment With Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Accomplished in a Recent Case.

Mr. Francis M. Poole, a harness maker, of Garvin, Lyon Co., Minn., says: "My illness started in 1902, with sharp pains all through my limbs. At first I thought it was rheumatism but the pains kept getting more and more severe and I grew steadily worse. Later a numbness came over my feet. It gradually extended up my legs to my spine and waist. By this time I had lost all control of my legs. Next my bladder and bowels were affected and I lost all control of them. At this stage of the disease I was perfectly helpless and from November, 1905, to April, 1906, I was confined to the bed. My memory was so affected that I thought I would lose my mind. I looked just like a dead person. My lips and finger nails were blue. I suffered with terrible sharp, shooting pains and could get relief only from the use of morphine.

"I was treated by five St. Paul doctors. All of them pronounced my case locomotor ataxia. One said I could not live a year and another told my wife all he could do for me was to give medicine to relieve the pain. I was discouraged and, when my brother-in-law urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, I did so willingly for he had read of their curing a case similar to mine. I started to take the pills in March, 1906, while I was still confined to bed. I took several boxes when I felt a slight change for the better and had a healthier look. I was finally able to go to the country but kept on with the treatment. The bluish color left my lips and my eyes became brighter. I took the pills a long time and the next spring in May I could walk around. In June I went to work although still weak. I kept on gaining and am now working without the return of a symptom of my former trouble and without losing a days' work. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People absolutely cured me and I want all fellow sufferers to know of my wonderful recovery."

Those who are interested in the treatment which cured this case should have our booklet, "Diseases of the Nervous System," which will be sent to every nervous sufferer upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

"WHY SHOULD I USE CUTICURA SOAP?"

"There is nothing the matter with my skin, and I thought Cuticura Soap was only for skin troubles." True, it is for skin troubles, but its great mission is to prevent skin troubles. For more than a generation its delicate emollient and prophylactic properties have rendered it the standard for this purpose, while its extreme purity and refreshing fragrance give to it all the advantages of the best of toilet soaps. It is also invaluable in keeping the hands soft and white, the hair live and glossy, and the scalp free from dandruff and irritation.

While its first cost is a few cents more than that of ordinary toilet soaps, it is prepared with such care and of such materials, that it wears to a wafer, often outlasting several cakes of other soap, and making its use, in practice, most economical. Cuticura Soap is sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, but the truth of these claims may be demonstrated without cost by sending to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston, for a liberal sample cake, together with a thirty-two page book on the skin and hair.

THE SHEPHERD BOY'S FAITH

by O. HENRY

"I—I would be a poet, sire."

FOR five days David, the shepherd boy of Vernoy, traveled the road to Paris, sleeping upon nature's balsamic beds or in peasants' ricks, eating of their black, hospitable bread, drinking from streams or the willing cup of the goat herd.

At length he crossed a great bridge and set his foot within the smiling city that crushed or crowned more poets than all the rest of the world. His breath came quickly as Paris sang to him in a little undertone her vital chant of greeting—the hum of voice and the foot and wheel.

High up under the eaves of an old house in the Rue Conti, David paid lodging, and set himself, in a wooden chair, to his poems. The street, once sheltering citizens of import and consequence, was now given over to those who ever follow in the wake of decline.

One afternoon he was returning from a foraging trip to the lower world, with bread and curds and a bottle of thin wine. Half way up his dark stairway he met—or rather came upon, for she rested on the stair—a young woman of a beauty that should balk even the justice of a poet's imagination. A loose, light cloak, flung open, showed a rich gown beneath. Her eyes changed swiftly and every little shade of thought. Within one moment they would be round and artless like a child's, and long and cozening like a gypsy's. One hand raised her gown, undraping a little shoe, high-heeled, with its ribbons dangling. So heavenly she was, so unfitted to stoop, so qualified to charm and command!

Ah, would monsieur pardon that she occupied the stairway, but the shoe!—the naughty shoe! Alas! it would not remain tied. Ah! if monsieur would be so gracious!

The poet's fingers trembled as he tied the contrary ribbons. Then he would have fled from the danger of her presence, but the eyes grew long and cozening, like a gypsy's, and held him. He leaned against the balustrade, clutching his bottle of sour wine.

"You have been so good," she said, smiling. "Does monsieur, perhaps, live in the house?"

"Yes, madame. I—I think so, madame."

"Perhaps in the third story, then?"

"No, madame; higher up."

The lady fluttered her fingers with the least possible gesture of impatience.

"Pardon. Certainly I am not discreet in asking. Monsieur will forgive me? It is surely not becoming that I should inquire where he lodges."

"Madame, do not say so. I live in the—"

"No, no, no; do not tell me. Now I see that I erred. But I cannot lose the interest I feel in this house and all that is in it. Once it was my home. Often I come here to dream of those happy days again. Will you let that be my excuse?"

"Let me tell you, then, for you need no excuse," stammered the poet. "I live in the top floor—the small room where the stairs turn."

"In the front room?" asked the lady, turning her head sidewise.

"In the rear, madame."

The lady sighed as if with relief.

"I will detain you no longer, then, monsieur," she said, employing the round and artless eye. "Take good care of my house. Alas! only the memories of it are mine now. Adieu, and accept my thanks for your courtesy."

She was gone, leaving but a smile and a trace of sweet perfume. David climbed the stairs as one in slumber.

Poet he must have been, for Yvonne was forgotten; this fine, new loveliness held him with its freshness and grace. The subtle perfume about her filled him with strange emotions.

On a certain night three persons were gathered about a table in a room on the third floor of the same house. Three chairs and the table and a lighted candle upon it was all the furniture. One of the persons was a huge man dressed in black. His expression was one of sneering pride.

This man struck the table with his fist and said, with controlled violence:

"Tonight. Tonight as he goes to midnight mass. I am tired of the plotting that gets nowhere. I am sick of signals and ciphers and secret meetings and such baragouin. Let us be honest traitors. If France is to be rid of him, let us kill him in the open, and not hunt with snares and traps. Tonight, I say. I back my words. My hand will do the deed. Tonight as he goes to mass."

The lady turned upon him a cordial look. Woman, however wedded to plots, must ever thus bow to rash courage. The big man stroked his upturned mustache.

"Dear captain," he said, in a great voice, softened by habit, "this time I agree with you. Nothing is to be gained by waiting. Enough of the palace guards belong to us to make the endeavor a safe one."

"Tonight," repeated Captain Desrolles, again striking the table. "You have heard me, marquis; my hand will do the deed."

"But now," said the huge man, softly, "comes a question. Word must be sent to our partisans in the palace, and a signal agreed upon. Our stanchest men must accompany the royal carriage. At this hour what messenger can penetrate so far as the south doorway? Ribout is stationed there; once a message is placed in his hands all will go well."

"I will send the message," said the lady.

"You, countess?" said the marquis, raising his eyebrows. "Your devotion is great, we know, but—"

"Listen!" exclaimed the lady, rising and resting her hands upon the table; "in a garret of this house lives a youth from the provinces as guileless and tender as the lambs he tended there. I have met him twice or thrice upon the stairs. I questioned him, fearing that he might dwell too near the room in which we are accustomed to meet. He is mine, if I will. He writes poems in his garret, and I think he dreams of me. He will do what I say. He shall take the message to the palace."

The marquis rose from his chair and bowed. "You did not permit me to finish my sentence, countess," he said. "I would have said: 'Your devotion is great, but your wit and charm are infinitely greater.'"

While the conspirators were thus engaged David was polishing some lines addressed to his amorette d'escalier. He heard a timorous knock at his door, and opened it, with a great throb, to behold her there, panting as one in straits, with eyes wide open and artless, like a child's.

"Monsieur," she breathed, "I come to you in distress. I believe you to be good and true, and I know of no other help. How I flew through the streets among the swaggering men! Monsieur, my mother is dying. My uncle is a captain of guards in the palace of the king. Some one must fly to bring him. May I hope—"

"Mademoiselle," interrupted David, his eyes shining with the desire to do her service, "your hopes shall be my wings. Tell me how I may reach him."

The lady thrust a sealed paper into his hand.

"Go to the south gate—the south gate, mind—and say to the guards there: 'The falcon has left his nest.' They will pass you, and you will go to the south entrance to the palace. Repeat the words, and give this letter to the man who will reply: 'Let him strike when he will.' This is the password, monsieur, entrusted to me by my uncle, for now when the country is disturbed and men plot against the king's life, no one without it can gain entrance to the palace grounds after nightfall. If you will, monsieur, take him this letter so that my mother may see him before she closes her eyes."

"Give it me," said David, eagerly. "But shall I let you return home through the streets alone so late? I—"

"No, no—fly. Each moment is like a precious jewel. Some time," said the lady, with eyes long and cozening, like a gypsy's, "I will try to thank you for your goodness."

The poet thrust the letter into his breast and bounded down the stairway. The lady, when he was gone, returned to the room below.

The eloquent eyebrows of the marquis interrogated her.

"He is gone," she said, "as fleet and stupid as one of his own sheep, to deliver it."

The table shook again from the batter of Captain Desrolles' fist.

"Sacred name!" he cried; "I have left my pistols behind! I can trust no others."

"Take this," said the marquis, drawing from beneath his cloak a shining, great weapon, ornamented with carven silver. "There are none truer. But guard it closely, for it bears my arms and crest, and already I am suspected. Me, I must put many leagues between myself and Paris this night. Tomorrow must find me in my chateau. After you, dear countess."

David sped. At the south gate of the king's residence a halberd laid to his breast, but he turned its point with the words: "The falcon has left his nest."

"Pass, brother," said the guard, "and go quickly."

On the south steps of the palace they moved to seize him, but again the mot de passe charmed the watchers. One among them stepped forward and began: "Let him strike—" but a flurry among the guards told of a surprise. A man of keen look and soldierly stride suddenly pressed through them and seized the letter which David held in his hand. "Come with me," he said, and led him inside the great hall. Then he tore open the letter and read it. He beckoned to a man uniformed as an officer of musketeers, who was passing.

"Captain Tetreau, you will have the guards at the south entrance and the south gate arrested and confined. Place men known to be loyal in their places." To David he said: "Come with me."

He conducted him through a corridor and an anteroom into a spacious chamber, where a melancholy man, somberly dressed, sat brooding in a great leather-covered chair. To that man he said:

"Sire, I have told you that the palace is as full of traitors and spies as a sewer is of rats. You have thought, sire, that it was my fancy. This man penetrated to your very door by their connivance. He bore a letter which I have intercepted. I have brought him here that your majesty may no longer think my zeal excessive."

"I will question him," said the king, stirring in his chair. He looked at David with heavy eyes dulled by an opaque film. The poet bent his knee.

"From where do you come?" asked the king.

"From the village of Vernoy, in the province of Eure-et-Loir, sire."

"What do you follow in Paris?"

"I—I would be a poet, sire."

"What did you in Vernoy?"

"I minded my father's flocks of sheep."

The king stirred again, and the film lifted from his eyes.

"Ah! in the fields!"

"Yes, sire."

"You lived in the fields; you went out in the cool of the morning and lay among the hedges in the grass. The flocks distributed themselves upon the hillside; you drank of the living stream; you ate your sweet, brown bread in the shade, and you listened, doubtless, to the blackbirds piping in the grove. Is not that so, shepherd?"

"It is, sire," answered David, with a sigh; "and to the bees at the flowers, and, maybe, to the grape gatherers singing on the hill."

"Yes, yes," said the king, impatiently; "maybe to them; but surely to the blackbirds. They whistled often, in the grove, did they not?"

"Nowhere, sire, so sweetly as in Eure-et-Loir. I have endeavored to express their song in some verses that I have written."

"If it please your majesty," interrupted a harsh voice, "I will ask a question or two of this rhymster."

"The loyalty," said the king, "of the Duke D'Aumale is too well proven to give offense." He sank into his chair, and the film came again over his eyes.

"First," said the duke, "I will read you the letter he brought."

> "Tonight is the anniversary of the dauphin's death. If he goes, as is his custom, to midnight mass to pray for the soul of his son, the falcon will strike, at the corner of the Rue Esplanade. If this be his intention, set a red light in the upper room at the southwest corner of the palace, that the falcon may take heed."

"Peasant," said the duke, sternly, "you have heard these words. Who gave you this message to bring?"

"My lord duke," said David, sincerely, "I will tell you. A lady gave it me. She said her mother was ill, and that this writing would fetch her uncle to her bedside. I do not know the meaning of the letter, but I will swear that she is beautiful and good."

"Describe the woman," commanded the duke, "and how came you to come to be her dupe?"

"Describe her?" said David, with a tender smile. "You would command words to perform miracles. Well, she is made of sunshine and deep shade. She is slender, like the alders, and moves with their grace. Her eyes change while you gaze into them; now round, and then half shut as the sun peeps between two clouds. When she comes, heaven is all about her; when she leaves, there is chaos and a scent of hawthorne blossoms. She came to me in the Rue Conti, No. 29."

"It is the house," said the duke, turning to the king, "that we have been watching. Thanks to the poet's tongue, we have a picture of the infamous Countess Quebedeux."

"Sire and my lord duke," said David, earnestly, "I hope my poor words have done no injustice. I have looked into that lady's eyes. I will stake my life that she is an angel, letter or no letter."

The duke looked at him steadily. "I will put you to the proof," he said, slowly. "Dressed as the king, you shall, yourself, attend mass in his carriage at midnight. Do you accept the test?"

David smiled. "I have looked into her eyes," he said. "I had my proof there. Take yours how you will."

Half an hour before 12 the Duke D'Aumale, with his own hands, set a red lamp in a southwest window of the palace. At ten minutes to the hour, David, leaning on his arm, dressed as the king, from top to toe, with his head bowed in his cloak, walked slowly from the royal apartments to the waiting carriage. The duke assisted him inside, and closed the door. The carriage whirled away along its route to the cathedral.

On the qui vive in a house at the corner of the Rue Esplanade was Captain Tetreau with 20 men, ready to pounce upon the conspirators when they should appear.

But it seemed that, for some reason, the plotters had slightly altered their plans. When the royal carriage had reached the Rue Christopher, one square nearer than the Rue Esplanade, forth from it burst Captain Desrolles, with his band of would-be regicides, and assailed the equipage. The guards upon the carriage, though surprised at the premature attack, descended and fought valiantly. The noise of conflict attracted the force of Captain Tetreau, and they came pelting down the street to the rescue. But, in the meantime, the desperate Desrolles had torn open the door of the king's carriage, thrust his weapon against the body of the dark figure inside, and fired.

Now, with loyal re-enforcements at hand, the street rang with cries and the rasp of steel, but the frightened horses had dashed away. Upon the cushions lay the dead body of the poor mock king and poet, slain by a ball from the pistol of Monseigneur, the Marquis de Beaupertuys.

HEALTH FOR THE CHILD.

The careful mother, watching closely the physical peculiarities of her children, soon learns that health is in a great measure dependent upon normal, healthy, regular bowel action. When the bowels are inactive, loss of appetite, restlessness during sleep, irritability and a dozen and one similar evidences of physical disorder are soon apparent.

Keep the bowels free and clear and good health is assured. At the first sign of constipation give the child a teaspoonful of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at bed-time and repeat the dose the following night, if necessary. You will find the child will quickly recover its accustomed good spirits, and eat and sleep normally.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is far preferable to salts, cathartics and purgative waters which are harsh in their action. Syrup Pepsin acts on the bowels easily and naturally, yet positively, and causes no griping or discomfort. Its tonic properties build up the stomach, liver and bowels, restoring their normal condition.

Druggists everywhere sell Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried this remedy, send for a sample to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill. He will gladly send a trial bottle without any expense to you whatever.

Her Idea of a Chicken Farm.

Every little actress in New York has a Long Island chicken farm. A well-known leading lady recently decided to follow the way of her sisters. She secured a lease on a good bit of property and then sought out a reputable poulterer.

"I want," she said firmly, "a thousand hens and"—less firmly—"a thousand roosters."

Why suffer under the curse of Dyspepsia when Garfield Tea can remove it?

Father Now in Second Place.

She was a prim miss of thirteen who stood before the rector of a well-known New York Episcopal church and looked him squarely in the eye. "Please repeat that fifth commandment again," he said, for he was catechising her with regard to her knowledge of the Scriptures apropos of the coming confirmations. "Honor thy mother and thy father, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," was the response. "Honor thy mother and thy father," mused the rector. "Who taught you that?" "Mother," was the response. "These are certainly suffragist days upon which we have fallen," remarked the minister. "Father used to come first."

The Biblical Injunction.

A Washington clergyman made a call of consolation upon a woman who had suffered a sad bereavement. "I hope," said the pastor, "that in your bitter trial you have found some ray of comfort from the Scriptures."

"Indeed I have, sir," was the confident though fearful reply.

"That's grand, sister," was the sympathetic observation of the minister. "May I ask what passage of the Good Book helped you most?"

"Grin and bear it."

Stingy Thing.

She—Oh, I have no doubt you love me; but your love lacks the supreme touch—unselfishness.

He—What makes you say that?

She—You admit it. You want me for yourself alone, you see.

Talented.

"Why do you think so?"

Of Course.

"What would you do if you had a million dollars?"

"Nothing."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879.

A ROTTEN GANG.

SUNBEAM, and Gazette wrong, says the Thief River Falls Times, about the low water in the Red Lake River being caused by log jams. We was not a bit wrong, and are not a little bit wrong when when we say; that government engineers office, at St,Paul have shown to the entire satisfaction of the people living along this river, that they were the servents and tools of the lumber companys, to do the work, that was to dirty for them to do themselves. Take the statements of D.N.Winton, at Thief River Falls, at that investigation. Did he deny that this, log jam had closed up Red Lake River? Not at all! Not a word from Mr. Winton on that subject. He left the dirty work for Major Shunk to do. We do not regret the work and expense that we have been to in showing up that St. Paul government engineers outfit, as they are. A gang that the lumber companys can depend on to make any kind of report to fit the occasion. The lumber companys won, but they may see the day that they won't laugh about it, if they continue to do business, beside their neighbors, the farmers living along the banks of Red Lake River, who have first seen the fish die and next their stock run down in flesh, and some of them die for want of water, and worst part to come yet, which is the sickness and death in their families, which is sure to follow the smell of this river when the spring floods open it up. Now laugh you Thief River Falls Times publishers, for you may be crying when you see those near and dear to you lying on their death bead, with typhoid feavor, When the Dr. tells you there is no hope for recovery, go down to your office, and write Major Shunk that you hope him and his family are well, and congratulate him on winning the fight to close up Red Lake River.

It is nonsense to talk about the rank and file of the LaFollette supporters turning to Taft, if La Follette drops out of the race. You can't mix fire and water, and there would be no use for the leaders to try to do it. They will go to Roosevelt with a stapede.

The Northern News, published at Spooner seems to be rather lonesome supporting Taft. We guess they are to near Canada, and suggest that they move down this way and look at this question from a farmers stand point.

Colors and Light.

White has the greatest property of reflecting light of any color and black the least. While white receives the color it immediately sends it away again in the form of reflected light. Black absorbs light. Lay a white and a black piece of cloth on the snow and that under the white cloth will remain as it is, while under the black one it will melt. This suggests a reason as to why white garments are coolest for summer wear. They do not absorb the heat and light from the sun, but reflect it off. In winter the dark absorbs the light and accomplishes more what one wants, so dark clothing is the common thing for winter use. If you want a cool house in summer paint it white.—New York World.

Terrible Temptation.

"Of course," said the man who was looking out of the window at the heavy rain, "I don't believe George Washington was capable of telling a lie. But I don't consider that cherry tree incident much of a test."

"Could you devise a better one?"

"Yes. I'd like to know what Washington would have said if he had stood at the door of a restaurant on a stormy night and the waiter had hurried up to him with a fine new silk umbrella with an ivory handle and no name on it and said, 'Isn't this yours, sir?' "—Washington Star.

WARNING!

Sign Nothing For Strangers.

Recently there has been a gentlemen traving throu the country, especially throu eastern Red Lake and Pennington counties, claiming to be from McIntosh representing some supposed land firm in Grand Forks listing farms for sale and getting the owners of land to sign listing contracts and tyeing them up for a period of six or 8 months, and listing the lands regardless of the price asked by the owners as that part it is entirely immeterial to them for the reason that it is not their intention at all to even attempt to sell these lands but merely to tie them up so that the owners themselves can not dispose of it, as while this party driving thro the country listing these lands may tell you that it is not their intention to record these contracts, but the facts are that they are being recorded at the Court house in Red Lake Falls and Thief River Falls, thus clouding the title which the farmer would not know anything about unless he should happen to sell himself, when getting out the abstract of title he would then see his contract on record which would prevent him from closing his deal and even prevent him from renewing his old loan on the same unless he first had settled with that land company paying whatever amount they would ask for releasing that contract of record.

It is an old game and has been worked by verious uncrupellous land firms in various places throut this and other States and only works a hardship on the owners of the land. Quaters have been listed for $5000,00 that would not bring $2500 which conclusively goes to show that it is not the selling of the land they are, after but simply tying it up and in that way, knowing that the farmer prehaps within a year or so would either sell it himself or have to make a new loan, and he would be obliged to come to them and pay them for getting it off the records. Even if a sale of that kind did not take place for the next ten years the contract would still be there so that sooner or later the settlement would necessarly have to be made.

Sign no contracts or agreements of any kind uless you are absolutly sure of what you are signing and if not go to your nearest bank or a person familiar with that kind of business and ask them about it, and in that way save yourself not only trouble but also money.

A BISMARCK STORY.

It Shows the Gentler Side of the Man of Blood and Iron.

The French surgeon Czernicke in his reminiscences of the Franco-Prussian war tells a story that seems to place Bismarck in a new and more gentle light. He says:

"Seated on some straw and propped up against a pillar of the church of Rezonville was one of our poor soldiers, a quite young man named Rossignol. A shell, striking him like the lash of a whip, had carried away both his eyes and the bridge of his nose, leaving the front of the skull bare. This fearful wound was covered with a dressing. He lay there calm, silent and motionless, in quiet resignation.

"Bismarck stopped in front of him and asked me what was his case. He seemed really touched. 'There is war for you, messieurs, the senators and deputies!' Then, turning to one of his suit, he said, 'Please bring me some wine and a glass.' He filled the glass to the brim, took a sip, and then, gently tapping the shoulder of the poor martyr, he said, 'My friend, will you not drink something?' Rousing himself from the deathlike stupor that was creeping over him, the man assented.

"We then saw Bismarck stoop and very softly and slowly give the wounded soldier the wine. Rising again, he drank what was left in the glass and said, 'What is your name, my boy, and where do you come from?' 'Rossignol; from Brittany.' The count then took his hand and said, 'I am Bismarck, my comrade, and I am very proud to have drunk out of the same glass as a brave man like you,' and, stretching his hand over the horribly mutilated head, he seemed to give him a mute benediction."

LONDON STORES.

When Customers Enter They Are Almost Compelled to Buy.

First and foremost the English excel in salesmanship. Once having got a possible purchaser inside the door, they reason he should be made profitable to them. The floor manager does not assume that attitude of royal indifference as with us. He watches the struggle between salesperson and customer. If the latter shows signs of escaping into the open with his purse intact another clerk is brought forward as a re-enforcement. Some establishments still lay fines on clerks who do not effect sales, but the system of inciting the sales force to its utmost efforts by giving percentages is now coming into vogue.

The method that London stores have of letting a cash girl conduct a customer who has finished his purchases to a central cash desk and wrapping counter, where he stands in line, keeping an anxious eye on his goods till they are parcelled, seems to us archaic and cumbersome. An Oxford street merchant, however, reasons differently:

"When a patron has finished his purchases he is better out of the way of new customers. English men and women prefer privacy when they are making purchases, which would be impossible were customers allowed to sit at the counter, awaiting their packages. Then the wrapping force works more rapidly when the patron watches and urges haste."

I did not see how that particular force could work any more slowly, but his other argument might have some merit.—Business.

SHETLAND'S TAME GULLS.

Each Family Has Its Own Flock and the Children Feed Them.

There are many small villages in the world that have only one street, but Lerwick, in Shetland, besides having only a single street, possesses only one tree. There are no birds there, not even a sparrow, but the seagulls are plentiful.

The seagulls are the sparrows of Lerwick, and as such they have a greater share in the town's life than the sparrows of London. In the morning you will note that a seagull sits on every chimney pot. Seagulls swoop and hover over every roof in town. The air is full of their strange, high, plaintive, haunting cries.

Every house has its own familiar seagulls and every street its own band of them. But they never mix. The children in each house have a pet name for their own particular seagulls, and having called them by those names, they feed them every day.

Each seagull knows what is meant for him. No bird attached to one house ever seeks to eat the food scattered from the house next door. He does not dare to do so. So all day long the seagulls hover and call over the roofs of Lerwick.

The people of the town, if they come across a little pile of rice laid upon the roadway, step over it with care. They know that it has been placed there for some seagull. And at night the seagulls leave their appointed chimneypots and fly gracefully away to their resting places on the rocks of the isle of Noss.—Fruit Magazine.

How Fishes Breathe.

By means of their gills fish breathe the air dissolved in water. The oxygen consumed by them is not that which forms the chemical constituent of the water, but that contained in the air which is dissolved in the water. Fishes transferred to water from which the air has been driven out by a high temperature or in which the air absorbed by them is not replaced are soon suffocated. They require aerated water to maintain life and they take it in constantly through their mouths and expel it through their gills, retaining the air. It follows that if the water in a lake should be completely cut off from contact with the air long enough to exhaust the supply of air the fish in the lake would die. It would take a severe and pretty long continued freeze to accomplish this, but it might happen and doubtless has frequently happened with a small body of water.—St. Nicholas.

Man and Woman.

Man is born an understanding and woman a love. The wife cannot enter into the proper duties of the man, nor the man, on the other hand, into the proper duties of the wife, because they differ, as wisdom and its love or thought and its affection or understanding and its will. In the proper duties of men the understanding, thought and wisdom act the chief part.—Swedenborg.

SPARE TIME TO LAUGH.

Brooding Over Your Worries Won't Lighten the Burden.

It is the duty of mankind, even in depressing circumstances, to strive to be cheerful. It is the general belief that if a man is not naturally light hearted he cannot make himself so.

Yet this is far from being the case, and there is many a man who is at present a weary burden to his relatives, miserable through the carking care of some bodily ailment perhaps or some worldly misfortune, who, if he had grown up with the idea that to be cheerful in all circumstances was one of the first duties of life, might still see a pleasant enough world round him.

The worries of a morose person will shorten his days, and the general justice of nature's arrangement provides that his early departure should entail no long regrets.

On the other hand, the man who can laugh keeps his health. To the perfectly healthy laughter comes often. Too commonly, though, as childhood is left behind, the habit fails, and a half smile is the most that visits the thought lined mouth of a modern man or woman. People become more and more burdened with the accumulations of knowledge and with the weighty responsibilities of life, but they should still spare time to laugh.—Detroit Free Press.

SEED GERMINATION.

In Some Cases the Development Is Remarkably Rapid.

It has been said that the seed of the globe turnip when growing increases its own weight fifteen times within a minute. The seed of this turnip is exceedingly minute, being not larger than the twentieth part of an inch in diameter, and yet in the course of a few months the seed will be developed by the soil into twenty-seven millions of times the bulk of the original, and this in addition to a considerable bunch of leaves.

On peat ground turnips have been found to increase by growth 15,990 times the weight of their seed each day they stood.

The funguses offer an instance of remarkably rapid growth. The great puff ball will attain the size of a pumpkin in a single night, and Lindley calculated that the cells whereof it is composed will multiply at the rate of 60,000,000 a minute.

Many seeds germinate in a very short period—the cress in two days, spinach, turnips and kidney beans in three days, lettuce in four, melons and gourds in five, most of the grain seeds in a week and hyssop at the end of a month. But others remain for a very long period without showing signs of germination.—New York Herald.

An Eye Arrester.

In this day of catch words and slogans, once in a while a roving eye will glance upon a phrase that sticks. Going down in a Broadway car the other day two tired looking men sat side by side, glancing disinterestedly out of the window opposite as the car sped past the signs in the wholesale dry goods district. All at once the gaze of both men focused at a certain point and they turned their heads to read the sign in full. On the door of one of the wholesale millinery houses was this legend: "Come in without knowing, but don't go out the same way." The eyes of both men met as they finished reading it, whereupon each smiled a bit. "Not such bad advice, that," said one, and his neighbor grunted approvingly.—New York Press.

Friday Dickens' Lucky Day.

Charles Dickens was not one of those who are superstitious concerning Friday. It was on Friday that many of the good things came to him, and it was on that day that he entered upon, paid the price and took possession of Gadshill, the one thing he coveted more than all of his other possessions. It was Gadshill that he had gazed upon when a wee bit of a boy with a hope, then giving little signs of fruition, that he might live to own it some day, and it was Gadshill whose walls he covered with mirrors in almost oriental magnificence.—Boston Record.

Unbalanced.

"What's the charge against this man?" asked the judge.

"We desire, your honor," replied the lawyer in the case, "to have him tried for insanity. His family is greatly worried about him."

"What has he done?"

"He has sold his automobile for the purpose of raising money with which to pay an honest debt."—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Democrats and Socialists did not do much "straw voting," at Tuesdays eletion, but if Taft gets the nomination, just watch them fellows vote in November, and it won't be any straw votes, but business votes.

The Agricultural meeting held at the Highlanding school house yesterday afternoon drew a large and appreciateve crowd of farmers to listen to the address of Mr. Bugesby, from the state University and Prof. Haskins, of Thief River Falls. The meeting will accomplish much good and we should try to get more of them held here.

Read the Warning to farmers published in another colum, and be sure to not sign away an interest in your farm to strangers for one silver dollar. Those who are of the opinion that they have only listed their farms for six months will find out their mistake when they visit the register of deeds office, and find that the contract says, that if the company don't sell in six months they can renew it for another six months, and so on for a hundred years, until you do sell, then they have "got you."

A BROWN ROAST.

From Eastern Deer Park:

Editor The Sunbeam:

The lumber comminys defeated the farmers living along Red Lake River in their fight about the log jams in the outlet of Red Lake.

This des son is what the farmers up here expected from the start of this fight, between the poor farmers on one side and the big lumber concerns, and their backers, (so called government officials) on the other side.

Now this outcome shows us farmers, and others, that there is no show to get a "square deal" for people belonging to the produceing class. Money reigns as king in this country! We must not imagin any longer that we are ruled by a government of the people for the people, but by a government by the corporations, and for the corporations.

We must stop voting for the old gang which we used to put in office, so as to get the most out of this misrepresentation, which we receive. If the farmer wants help, he must help himself. If we expect a fair and square deal, there is only one solution left, and that is a government under Socialism. Our present system is not up to date. Try a new one. Vote a straight socialist ticket whenever the chance is offered to you, and watch the result.

ANIMAL SWIMMERS.

Best of All, Though Not the Swiftest, Is the Polar Bear.

The rhinoceros and hippopotamus are wonderful swimmers and divers, while the Indian elephant crosses great rivers with heavy loads. The elk and the reindeer are first class swimmers. The elk keeps his head above water and crosses directly from bank to bank to avoid turning. The reindeer, on the other hand, turns as often as he likes, keeping his head only a little above the surface.

But of all swimmers of all climes the best, though not the swiftest, is the polar bear, who passes half his time in the water swimming and diving. His swimming power is nothing short of miraculous if it be remembered that the water in the regions he frequents is invariably cold and that cold is normally prohibitive to good swimming. There are bears that can swim from forty to fifty [illegible] without great effort.

One of the [illegible] swimming animals is the [illegible] one o [illegible] at hand a squirrel born in [illegible] had never seen water, wanted to see if it could swim and took it with him to a rowboat to the center of a lake. WHY NOT MAKE $200.00 A MONTH - - That's $50.00 a Week, almost $10.00 a Day

Selling Victor Safes and fire-proof boxes to merchants, doctors, lawyers, dentists and well-to-do farmers, all of whom realize the need of a safe, but do not know how easy it is to own one. Salesmen declare our proposition one of the best, clean-cut money-making opportunities ever received. Without previous experience YOU can duplicate the success of others. Our handsomely illustrated 200-page catalog will enable you to present the subject to customers in as interesting a manner as though you were piloting them through our factory. Men appointed as salesmen receive advice and instructions for selling safes, giving convincing talking points which it is impossible for a prospective customer to deny. Why don't YOU be the first to apply from your vicinity before someone else gets the territory? We can favor only one salesman out of each locality.

Our New Home. Capacity 20,000 Safes Annually.

The 25th anniversary of our company was celebrated by erecting the most modern safe factory in the world. Wide-awake men who received our special selling inducement, rendered it necessary to double our output. We are spending many thousands of dollars enlarging our sales organization, but to learn all particulars. It will cost you only the price of a postal card.

Marlin

THE Marlin Model 1894 is a medium light weight repeating rifle, a well proportioned, finely balanced gun with all the advantages and comforts of the Marlin solid-top, side ejecting construction. It is quick and easy of operation, accurate up to 300 yards and a very pleasant gun to carry and to shoot.

For settled districts and farming country where the shooting at woodchucks, badgers, foxes, 'coons, hawks, etc., is at ranges from 100 to 200 yards, the .25-20 and .32-20 rifles with the black and low-pressure smokeless loads cannot be equalled for accuracy and safety. The factory ammunition for the Model '94 rifles is cheap, and can be reloaded at very small cost.

The up-to-date sportsman needs the "Marlin Book" every day in the year. It contains 136 pages of live stuff for the man who loves a good gun and wants to know everything about it. FREE for 3 stamps postage.

Marlin

THE Marlin Model 1894 is a medium light weight repeating rifle, a well proportioned, finely balanced gun with all the advantages and comforts of the Marlin solid-top, side-ejecting construction. It is quick and easy of operation, accurate up to 300 yards and a very pleasant gun to carry and to shoot.

For settled districts and farming country where the shooting at woodchucks, badgers, lynx, 'coons, hawks, etc., is at ranges from 100 to 200 yards, the .25-20 and .32-20 rifles with the black and low-pressure smokeless loads cannot be equalled for accuracy and safety. The factory ammunition for the Model '94 rifles is cheap, and can be reloaded at very small cost.

The up-to-date sportsman needs the "Marlin Book" every day in the year. It contains 136 pages of live stuff for the man who loves a good gun, and wants to know everything about it. FREE for 3 stamps postage.

Tells How She Keeps Her Health — Happiness For Those Who Take Her Advice.

Scottville, Mich.—"I want to tell you how much good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Sanative Wash have done me. I live on a farm and have worked very hard. I am forty-five years old, and am the mother of thirteen children. Many people think it strange that I am not broken down with hard work and the care of my family, but I tell them of my good friend, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and that there will be no backache and bearing down pains for them if they will take it as I have. I am scarcely ever without it in the house.

"I will say also that I think there is no better medicine to be found for young girls. My eldest daughter has taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for painful periods and irregularity, and it has helped her.

"I am always ready and willing to speak a good word for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I tell every one I meet that I owe my health and happiness to your wonderful medicine."—Mrs. J. G. JOHNSON, Scottville, Mich., R.F.D. 3.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from native roots and herbs, contains no narcotics or harmful drugs, and today holds the record of being the most successful remedy for woman's ills known.

BURNING DAYLIGHT

By JACK LONDON

AUTHOR OF "THE CALL OF THE WILD," "WHITE FANG," "MARTIN EDEN," ETC.

(Copyright, 1910, by the New York Herald Company.)
(Copyright, 1910, by the MacMillan Company.)

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his 30th birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling, in which over $100,000 is staked. Harnish loses his money and his mine but wins the mail contract. He starts on his mail trip with dogs and sledge, telling his friends that he will be in the big Yukon gold strike at the start. Burning Daylight makes a sensationally rapid run across country with the mail, appears at the Tivoli and is now ready to join his friends in a dash to the new gold fields. Deciding that gold will be found in the up-river district Harnish buys two tons of flour, which he declares will be worth its weight in gold, but when he arrives with his flour he finds the big flat desolate. A comrade discovers gold and Daylight reaps a rich harvest. He goes to Dawson, becomes the most prominent figure in the Klondike and defeats a combination of capitalists in a vast mining deal. He returns to civilization.

CHAPTER VII.

In no blaze of glory did Burning Daylight descend upon San Francisco. Not only had he been forgotten, but the Klondike along with him. The world was interested in other things, and the Alaskan adventure, like the Spanish War, was an old story. He settled down in St. Francis Hotel, was interviewed by the cub-reporters on the hotel-run, and received brief paragraphs of notice for twenty-four hours.

Several months passed in San Francisco, during which time he studied the game and its rules, and prepared himself to take a hand.

Tiring of being merely an onlooker, he ran up to Nevada, where the new gold-mining boom was fairly started—"just to try a flutter," as he phrased it to himself. The flutter on the Tonopah Stock Exchange lasted just ten days, during which time his smashing, wild-bull game played ducks and drakes with the more stereotyped gamblers, and at the end of which time, having gambled Floridel into his fist, he let go for a net profit of half a million. Whereupon, smacking his lips, he departed for San Francisco and the St. Francis Hotel. It tasted good, and his hunger for the game became more acute.

And once more the papers sensationalized him. BURNING DAYLIGHT was a big-letter headline again. Interviewers flocked about him. Old files of magazines and newspapers were searched through, and the romantic and historic Elam Harnish, Adventurer of the Frost, King of the Klondike, and Father of the Sourdoughs, strode upon the breakfast table of a million homes along with the toast and breakfast foods. Even before his elected time, he was forcibly launched into the game. Financiers and promoters, and all the flotsam and jetsam of the sea of speculation surged upon the shores of his eleven millions. In self-defense he was compelled to open offices. He dabbled in little things at first—"stalling for time," as he explained it to Holdsworthy, a friend he had made at the Alta-Pacific Club. Daylight himself was a member of the club, and Holdsworthy had proposed him. And it was well that Daylight played closely at first, for he was astounded by the multitudes of sharks—"ground-sharks," he called them—that flocked about him. He saw through their schemes readily enough, and even marveled that such numbers of them could find sufficient prey to keep them going. Their rascality and general dubiousness was so transparent that he could not understand how any one could be taken in by them.

So it was that he resolved to leave the little men, the Holdsworthys, alone; and, while he met them in good fellowship, he chummed with none, and formed no deep friendships. He did not dislike the little men, the men of the Alta-Pacific, for instance. He merely did not elect to choose them for partners in the big game in which he intended to play. What this big game was, even he did not know. He was waiting to find it. And in the meantime he played small hands, investing in several arid-lands reclamation projects and keeping his eyes open for the big chance when it should come along.

And then he met John Dowsett, the great John Dowsett. It was the first big magnate Daylight had met face to face, and he was pleased and charmed. There was such a kindly humanness about the man, such a genial democraticness, that Daylight found it hard to realize that this was the John Dowsett, president of a string of banks, insurance manipulator, reputed ally of the lieutenants of Standard Oil, and known ally of the Guggenhammers. Nor did his looks belie his reputation and his manner. Physically, he guaranteed all that Daylight knew of him. Despite his sixty years and snow-white hair, his hand-shake was firmly hearty, and he showed no signs of decrepitude, walking with a quick, snappy step, making all movements definitely and decisively.

It was not long afterward that Daylight came on to New York. A letter from John Dowsett had been the cause—a simple little typewritten letter of several lines. But Daylight had thrilled as he read it. The bald sentences seemed gorged with mystery. "Our Mr. Howison will call upon you at your hotel. He is to be trusted. We must not be seen together. You will understand after we have had our talk." Daylight conned the words over and over. That was it. The big game had arrived, and it looked as if he were being invited to sit in and take a hand. Surely, for no other reason would one man so peremptorily invite another man to make a journey across the continent.

They met—thanks to "our" Mr. Howison—up the Hudson, in a magnificent country home. Daylight, according to instructions, arrived in a private motor car which had been furnished him. Dowsett was already there, and another man whom Daylight recognized before the introduction was begun. It was Nathaniel Letton, and none other. Daylight had seen his face a score of times in the magazines and newspapers, and read about his standing in the financial world, and about his endowed University of Daratona. He, likewise, struck Daylight as a man of power, though he was puzzled in that he could find no likeness to Dowsett. Except in the matter of cleanness—a cleanness that seemed to go down to the deepest fibers of him—Nathaniel Letton was unlike the other in every particular. Thin to emaciation, he seemed a cold flame of a man. Not more than fifty, thatched with a sparse growth of iron-gray hair, he looked several times the age of Dowsett.

They drank—that is, Nathaniel Letton took mineral water served by the smoothly operating machine of a lackey who inhabited the place, while Dowsett took Scotch and soda and Daylight a cocktail. Leon Guggenhammer arrived in the midst of the drink, and ordered Scotch. Daylight studied him curiously. This was one of the great Guggenhammer family; a younger one, but nevertheless one of the crowd with which he had locked grapples in the North. Nor did Leon Guggenhammer fail to mention cognizance of that old affair. He complimented Daylight on his prowess—"The echoes of Ophir came down to us, you know. And I must say, Mr. Daylight—er, Mr. Harnish, that you whipped us roundly in that affair."

"I Must Say, Mr. Harnish, That You Whipped Us Roundly in That Affair."

Leon Guggenhammer was young and fat. Not a day more than thirty, his face, save for the adumbated puff sacks under the eyes, was as smooth and lineless as a boy's. The talk soon centered down to business. Dowsett broached the plan, aided by an occasional remark from the other two, while Daylight asked questions. Whatever the proposition was, he was going into it with his eyes open. And they filled his eyes with the practical vision of what he had in mind.

"They will never dream you are with us," Guggenhammer interjected, as the outlining of the matter drew to a close, his handsome Jewish eyes flashing enthusiastically. "They'll think you are raiding on your own in proper buccaneer style."

"Of course, you understand, Mr. Harnish, the absolute need for keeping our alliance in the dark," Nathaniel Letton warned, gravely.

Daylight nodded his head.

"And you also understand," Letton went on, "that the result can only be productive of good. The thing is legitimate and right, and the only ones who may be hurt are the stock gamblers themselves. It is not an attempt to smash the market. As you see yourself, you are to bull the market. The honest investor will be the gainer."

"Yes, that's the very thing," Dowsett said. "The commercial need for copper is continually increasing. Ward Valley Copper, and all that it stands for—practically one-quarter of the world's supply, as I have shown you—is a big thing, how big, even we can scarcely estimate. Our arrangements are made. We have plenty of capital ourselves, and yet we want more. Also, there is too much Ward Valley out to suit our present plans. Thus we kill both birds with one stone. Not only will you bull Ward Valley, but you will at the same time gather Ward Valley in. This will be of inestimable advantage to us, while you and all of us will profit by it as well. And as Mr. Letton has pointed out, the thing is legitimate and square. On the eighteenth the directors meet, and, instead of the customary dividend, a double dividend will be declared."

"There will be all sorts of rumors on the street," Dowsett warned Daylight, "but do not let them frighten you. These rumors may even originate with us. You can see how and why clearly. But rumors are to be no concern of yours. You are on the inside. All you have to do is buy, buy, buy, and keep on buying to the last stroke, when the directors declare the double dividend. Ward Valley will jump so that it won't be feasible to buy after that."

"And one other thing, Mr. Harnish," Guggenhammer said, "if you exceed your available cash, or the amount you care to invest in the venture, don't fail immediately to call on us. Remember, we are behind you."

"Yes, we are behind you," Dowsett repeated.

Nathaniel Letton nodded his head in affirmation.

CHAPTER VIII.

Back at his hotel, though nearly two in the morning, he found the reporters waiting to interview him. Next morning there were more. And thus, with blare of paper trumpet, was he received by New York. Once more, with beating of tom-toms and wild hullaballoo, his picturesque figure strode across the printed sheet. The King of the Klondike, the hero of the Arctic, the thirty-million-dollar millionaire of the North, had come to New York. What had he come for? To trim the New Yorkers as he had trimmed the Tonopah crowd in Nevada?

They were prepared for him to play, and, when heavy buying of Ward Valley began, it was quickly decided that he was the operator. Financial gossip buzzed and hummed. He was after the Guggenhammers once more. The story of Ophir was told over again and sensationalized until even Daylight scarcely recognized it. Still, it was all grist to his mill. The stock gamblers were clearly befooled. Each day he increased his buying, and so eager were the sellers that Ward Valley rose but slowly. A wildly exciting time was his during the week preceding Thursday the eighteenth. Not only was he gambling as he had never gambled before, but he was gambling at the biggest table in the world for stakes so large that even the case-hardened habitues of that table were compelled to sit up. In spite of the unlimited selling, his persistent buying compelled Ward Valley steadily to rise, and as Thursday approached, the situation became acute. Something had to smash. How much Ward Valley was this Klondike gambler going to buy? How much could he buy? What was the Ward Valley crowd doing all this time? Daylight appreciated interviews with them that appeared—interviews delightfully placid and non-committal. Leon Guggenhammer even hazarded the opinion that this Northland Croesus might possibly be making a mistake. But not that they cared, John Dowsett explained. "It is purely gambling from beginning to end," were Nathaniel Letton's words; "and we refuse to have anything to do with it or to take notice of it in any way."

During this time Daylight had several secret meetings with his partners—one with Leon Guggenhammer, one with John Dowsett, and two with Mr. Howison. Beyond congratulations, they really amounted to nothing; for, as he was informed, everything was going satisfactorily. But on Tuesday morning a rumor that was disconcerting came to Daylight's ears. It was also published in the Wall Street Journal, and it was to the effect, on apparently straight-inside information, that on Thursday, when the directors of Ward Valley met, instead of the customary dividend being declared, an assessment would be levied. It was the first check Daylight had received. It came to him with a shock that if the thing were so he was a broken man. And it also came to him that all this colossal operating of his was being done on his own money. Dowsett, Guggenhammer and Letton were risking nothing. It was a panic, shortlived, it was true, but sharp enough while it lasted to make him remember Holdsworthy and the brick-yard, and to impel him to cancel all buying orders while he rushed to a telephone.

"Nothing in it—only a rumor," came Leon Guggenhammer's throaty voice in the receiver. "As you know," said Nathaniel Letton, "I am one of the directors, and I should certainly be aware of it were such action contemplated." And John Dowsett: "I warned you against just such rumors. There is not an iota of truth in it—certainly not. I tell you on my honor as a gentleman."

Heartily ashamed of himself for his temporary loss of nerve, Daylight returned to his task. The cessation of buying had turned the Stock Exchange into a bedlam, and down all the line of stocks the bears were smashing. Ward Valley, as the apex, received the brunt of the shock, and was already beginning to tumble. Daylight calmly doubled his buying orders. And all through Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday morning, he went on buying, while Ward Valley rose triumphantly higher. Still they sold, and still he bought, exceeding his power to buy many times over, when delivery was taken into account. What of that? On this day the double dividend would be declared, he assured himself. The pinch of delivery would be on the shorts. They would be making terms with him.

And then the thunderbolt struck. True to the rumor, Ward Valley levied the assessment. Daylight threw up his arms. He verified the report and quit. Not alone Ward Valley, but all securities were being hammered down by the triumphant bears. As for Ward Valley, Daylight did not even trouble to learn if it had fetched bottom or was still tumbling. Not stunned, not even bewildered, while Wall Street went mad, Daylight withdrew from the field to think it over. After a short conference with his brokers, he proceeded to his hotel, on the way picking up the evening papers and glancing at the head-lines. BURNING DAYLIGHT CLEANED OUT, he read; DAYLIGHT GETS HIS; ANOTHER WESTERNER FAILS TO FIND EASY MONEY.

He passed up to his rooms, ordered a Martini cocktail, took off his shoes, and sat down to think. After half an hour he roused himself to take the drink, and as he felt the liquor pass warmingly through his body, his features relaxed into a slow, deliberate yet genuine grin. He was laughing at himself.

"Buncoed, by gosh!" he muttered.

STATE HIGHWAYS COMMISSION APPORTIONS 1912 FUND AMONG THE DIFFERENT COUNTIES.

MINIMUM SHARE IS $2,000

South Fares Best—Result of Quarter Mill Tax and Share of Federal Land Sales—Pennington County Road Approved.

St. Paul.—The state highway commission today apportioned the 1912 road fund amounting to $340,000, among the counties of the state. The money comes from the quarter-mill tax levy, income from investments of the internal improvement land fund, and the 5 per cent given the state from sale of the federal lands within the state. The total is about $20,000 more than was believed would be available.

Southern Part of State Gets Most.

The joint resolution, passed by the last Legislature, providing that counties, which did not share in the old "pork barrel" appropriation, should first receive approximately $100,000 before apportioning the entire sum throughout the state was generally observed, although a few deviations were made.

The minimum each county will get this year is $2,000 and the maximum $8,000. The counties in the northern part of the state get approximately $140,300 of the fund and counties in the southern part of the state $199,700.

Approval of the proposed new state highway in Pennington county was given by the commission.

It is intended by this approval to provide a basis on which opponents of the Elwell road law may start proceedings in the courts to test the validity of the bill if they so desire. The commission also placed its approval on the Deer river and Northome road.

FARMERS' BODY ON ROAD

Leading Stock Raiser of Otter Tail County Expires Suddenly.

Fergus Falls.—Parties who were in from the town of Aastad brought news of the death of Thorwald H. Thorsoe, one of the leading stock raisers of this county, his body being found by the roadside near his home. Mr. Thorsoe had driven to Wendell, eighteen miles south of here, to sell some hogs and was returning home late in the evening. A neighbor who happened to be coming from the opposite direction noticed that his team had left the road and gone over to a haystack, and went over to investigate. He found the team without a driver and going back over the road which they had come, he discovered the body of Mr. Thorson. He had apparently died from heart disease.

Mr. Thorsoe made a specialty of raising thoroughbred stock, and took a large percentage of the prizes at the county fair here last fall.

SEEK MURDER SUSPECT

St. Louis County Authorities Expect Arrest of Slayer of Asa Shepard.

Duluth.—The sheriff's office is making every effort to apprehend Frank McClusky, on whose land the body of Asa Shepard, the Kelsey homesteader, was found buried in the snow with evidence of murder.

Sheriff Meining received a second telegram from Deputy Sheriff Frank Magie, at Kelsey, in which it is intimated that the murdered Grand Army veteran never went to Superior to mortgage his land. The deputy telegraphed that Shepard had no acquaintance in Superior, and that his murderer came to Superior with the deed to his farm and his pension papers. The deputy stated that McClusky was seen in Eveleth February 29, with $300 in his possession.

Holding Company Organized.

Fergus Falls.—Articles of incorporation of the Perham Holding company were filed here, the company being organized for the purpose of taking over the business of the late Peter Schroeder. The company is organized with capital of $100,000, and the incorporators are D. S. Culver, of St. Paul, and L. W. Oberhauser, J. H. Shea, M. Wais of Perham and Ralph Pederson of Moorhead. Mr. Schroeder owned a flouring mill, a brewery, several farms and village property in Perham, Detroit and Frazee.

SHRINKAGE IS SMALL

State Butter Tests Do Not Support the Contention of Wholesalers.

St. Paul.—The butter shrinkage tests just completed by the state department of weights and measures at the old Capitol did not bear out the contention of the wholesalers that a pound of butter would shrink one-half ounce in twenty-four hours. On the contrary the tests showed that the shrinkage in thirteen days was only seven thirty-seconds of an ounce per pound.

The butter tested was packed in pound cartons and was purchased by the department immediately after it was packed. It was kept at a constant temperature of 40 degrees Fahrenheit.

The tests will be continued by the department in connection with moisture tests until a positive basis for shrinkage has been arrived at. It is the belief of the chemists that the reason for the high shrinkage rate shown by some butter is that it contains a very high percentage of water in the first place. The creamery men, in many instances, do not work their butter now like they formerly did and therefore little of the water is worked out of it, they contend.

City Sealer W. M. Peterson has made arrangements for conducting a thorough shrinkage test, which will be entirely distinct from the tests now being conducted by the state department.

BALLOT ANNOUNCED.

No Election For Grand Master of Odd Fellows.

Red Wing.—Peter A. Nelson today announced the official vote for the election of officers of the Grand lodge of the I. O. O. F. as follows:

For Grand Master—T. J. Catton, Minneapolis, 357 votes; M. H. McDivitt, Minneapolis, 328; H. W. Parker, Winnebago, 612; Herman W. Phillips, St. Paul, 637; Total vote cast 1,934, votes necessary for choice one-third of all cast, which would be 646 votes. The three highest will be voted on at the Grand Lodge session in June.

For Deputy Grand Master—A. W. Anees, Windom, 957; F. E. Franklin, Alexandria, 946.

For Grand Warden—Frank Bose, St. Paul, 270; Eugene Boss, Wadena, 1,162; Leroy Brown, St. Paul, 486, Total vote cast, 1,908; necessary for choice, 636.

Grand Secretary—A. L. Bolton, St. Paul, 1,591; Horace E. Johnson, Minneapolis, 360.

Grand Treasurer — Cassius M. Sprague, Sauk Center, 1,833.

Grand Representative, two year term—W. W. Brown, Long Prairie, 530; F H. Castner, Minneapolis, 744; Frank L. Powers, St. Paul, 648. Total votes cast, 1,922. Necessary for choice, 640.

Grand Representative, one year—Peter A. Nelson, Red Wing, 1,813.

MISSING MAN SLAIN

Body of Aged Kelsey, Minn., Farmer Found by Deputy Sheriff.

Duluth.—Asa Shepard, a Civil war veteran, 76 years old, who has been missing from his homestead near Kelsey, four miles from here, since February 23, was murdered, according to a telegram received here from a deputy sheriff sent from Duluth to investigate. The telegram read: "Have found Shepard's body. He was murdered."

Shepard was a widower and recently purchased 144 acres of land near Kelsey. For the past year he has not resided on the homestead, but has been living in a small shack on the edge of the village. A week ago Friday he was last seen alive. He was then in good health. When he was missed a search was made, and his friends in Duluth were questioned, as he frequently came to this city to attend Grand Army gatherings.

The finding of his body by the deputy solves the mystery of his disappearance, but the reason for the murder is still unknown. It is believed that the aged man was probably killed for his money.

BRAINERD CLEANING UP.

City Council Revokes Seven Saloon Licenses For Violations.

Brainerd.—Following an all-day session of the Brainerd city council, attended by every councilman, the city attorney, Mayor H. P. Dunn and the attorneys for the saloonkeepers, the council, after hearing the evidence of policemen and witnesses regarding violations of the 11 o'clock and Sunday closing laws, revoked the liquor licenses of seven saloon men. Those whose licenses were canceled were Maurice Lemoine, Nicholas Lauer, John Hagen, P. E. McCabe, Bosley & Anderson, Walter Kanenberg and Andy Glynn. Four of these are hotel bars. Two licenses, those of Thienes & Bourassa, and W. B. Larrabee, were not revoked.

This wholesale housecleaning comes as a result of the violation of Mayor Dunn's orders, who had the police repeatedly warn every liquor man two weeks ago not to violate the closing laws. Saloon men have until March 12 to dispose of their stocks.

Wreck Indictments Asked.

St. Paul. — Attorney General Smith has announced that he will likely take action in the Milwaukee railroad wreck at Odessa, Minn., in which ten people lost their lives. He will ask for indictments charging those responsible with manslaughter. Judge Flaherty of Morris has notified Mr. Smith that if desired he will call a special term of court for April 2, but the legal department prefers to wait until the regular term.

The maximum fine for manslaughter is $1,000.

MOORHEAD ON STAND AGAIN

RELATES HOW HE FEARED BEING INTERCEPTED.

Moorhead Man Says Logging Line Zigzagged Through Best Timber Tract.

Washington, D. C. — W. K. Moorhead, witness before the Graham committee, was again on the stand and was asked by Representative George to go into details regarding his statement that when collecting affidavits on the White Earth reservation he feared he might be intercepted in his effort to take the affidavits to Washington. "When I was about ready to return to Washington," Mr. Moorhead replied, "a friend of mine who had recently been in Park Rapids, the nearest point to the railroad, said that several persons had asked when I would reach Park Rapids and when I would start for Washington. My friend said he inferred from their questions that they hoped to persuade me not to present my affidavits to the federal authorities and might even accompany me on the train.

"It was plain they represented the interests involved in my affidavits. Not desiring to take any risks I proceeded north and took the railroad at another point."

Mr. Moorhead also discussed the construction of the Nichols-Chisholm logging railroad, running 15 miles north of Pontsford in navigable waters. "This incident in the White Earth history should be investigated. The Nichols-Chisholm people were given concessions to pass over the Indian lands with their railroad after compensating the owners for timber. It appears, however, that the compensation was merely nominal, and that the railroad builders twisted their route in and out so as to pass through the finest pine timber, besides cutting a path many times wider than their permit allowed. When I saw the amount paid the Indians for this timber I was amazed at its smallness."

TO PUSH RIVER WORK

Government Prepares for Short, Active Season on Mississippi.

Winona.—A short but active season is the general outlook for the government in its work of improving the Mississippi river for navigation this year. It is generally conceded that government crews will be unable to resume work along the river for at least six weeks, as ice in the Mississippi is from three to four feet in thickness.

Larger crews than ever before will replace the ones which operated in this section last year. It is understood also that two or three extra crews will be operating this year to augment the government's force. One or two of these will work in the immediate vicinity of Lake Pepin.

When the season's work is completed the sixteen-mile stretch between Winona and Richmond, which is said to be a model of river construction, will become merely a link in a long chain of similar channel. The entire river from Lake Pepin to the Wisconsin river will compare favorably with this sixteen miles.

Electric Company Sues City.

Fergus Falls.—Papers have been filed in the United States court in this city in a suit brought by the Western Electric company against the city of Detroit, Minn., for $6,366.33. The company alleges that it contracted to put in a municipal electric light plant for the city and was to receive $11,628 for the labor and material. It was also to be paid for extras, and these amounted to $4,667.07. The city has paid something over $9,000, and was to pay the balance when the plant was formally accepted, but it is alleged that it has delayed the formal acceptance and final payment, although the plant has been in successful operation for over a year.

School Site Fight Renewed.

Grand Rapids.—Judge Templeton of the district court has been advised that the plaintiffs in the famous Minot normal school site suit will appeal to the supreme court from the decision which was made by him. The plaintiffs contend that there was an agreement between themselves and the board of normal control whereby the property that was donated to the state for normal school purposes, and which was a part of the city of Minot, was to be vacated so far as the easements held by the city for streets and alleys were concerned.

Asks Relief For Indians.

Washington.—Chairman Graham of the White Earth investigating committee, introduced a bill providing an appropriation of $26,000 for the immediate relief of diseased and indigent members of the White Earth Indian tribe. The proposed fund is to be taken from the White Earth money now in the federal treasury and is to be handled by the Red Cross society, through whom clothing, medicine, attention and other care will be distributed among the sufferers.

Great Northern Gains Big.

St. Paul. — The gross earnings of the Great Northern Railway company for the first seven months of the present fiscal year exceeded those of any similar period in the history of the system. Even the high mark of 1910 was eclipsed. The operating revenue of the Great Northern for the period named was $40,424,468.86, a gain of $2,315,052.93. Total operating expenses were $20,202,174.84, a decrease of nearly $1,000,000, leaving a net revenue of over $19,000,000, or an actual increase of $3,270,632.25.

SILAGE IS GOOD FOR SHEEP

Will Be Found Most Beneficial Feed for Animals During Long Winter Season for Feeding.

(By J. C. COURTER.)

There has been great difference of opinion concerning the value of silage as a sheep feed. In our opinion silage is a good and safe feed for old and young sheep if it is free from mold, and if it is fed carefully. Moreover, the central western farmer will find silage a most beneficial food to tone up the digestive tract of his sheep throughout the long winter season for feeding. Silage acts through the winter much the same as grass does through the summer, keeping a bloom and a thrift on the sheep that is hard to equal without it.

Lambs which are being fattened for market need less silage than the older ewes, and particular pains must be taken to keep only fresh, sweet silage for them. Cattle feeders find good sound silage a very excellent fattening feed in itself, but sheep will not handle as much straight silage as cattle.

Lambs being fed for the market should be slowly started on silage, giving them only a taste during the first week. Gradually then for three more weeks the quantity should be increased until they are getting all they will eat up nearly clean.

All these rules can be changed somewhat, of course, yet they will serve as a reliable, practical guide, for they are the result of experience. However, any farmer feeding silage should remember:

1. Never feed moldy silage.
2. Never feed silage for a long time that is noticeably sour.
3. Never start in heavily at first.
4. Never feed silage heavy in the grain one day and silage light in the grain the next.
6. Never allow silage to lay in the troughs from one feeding time to the other.
6. Never feed silage that is noticeably frosted.
7. Never leave the salt box empty.
8. Always watch the appetites of the sheep, and if they seem tired of silage cut down on the ration until they grow eager for more.

SALT NECESSARY FOR CATTLE

Can Always Be Available for Animals by Use of Small Box With Moon-Shaped Hole.

The best way of salting cattle is to have it always available so that they may go to it at pleasure. This can be accomplished by having a brick of salt tacked up under the shed where the animals can lick it, or another good way to use loose salt is to construct a box, as shown in the illustration, which is partially filled with salt, says the Homestead. The hole should be large enough that the animal can put its nose into it and lift the lid up. The cattle will examine the box, and smelling the salt through the half-moon shaped hole, put their noses in and lift the lid up. As soon as they are through licking, the lid will drop down and protect the salt from dirt and dust, and from rain, if the box is placed in pasture.

LIVE STOCK NOTES

Teach the colt to draw loads by degrees.

Gentleness pays best with the colt or horse.

It is dangerous to feed millet to the brood mare.

Wet the hay and not the oats for a coughing horse.

Always approach a strange horse at the shoulder.

Stop at the top of the hill and let your horse get breath.

Use few words with a horse, but have them understood.

A draft horse should have a large chest and square shoulders.

There is no better place to fit a colt for market than on the farm.

A horse that is trained without blinds is usually the safer horse.

Match horses with reference to size and motion particularly, to color if you can.

If you find it necessary to change the horse's feed cut the amount down for a time.

Be careful about feeding horses inclined to heaves, too much hay, or hay that is dusty.

Great care should be used in watering the horses. A little and often is the best way.

One of the chief advantages of feeding live stock on the farm is the maintenance of soil fertility.

The shoe should fit the foot. Don't let the blacksmith cut the bars, or frogs to make the foot fit the shoe.

Satisfactory results were obtained last year at the Kansas Agricultural [illegible]

Backache

Is only one of many symptoms which some women endure through weakness or displacement of the womanly organs. Mrs. Lizzie White of Memphis, Tenn., wrote Dr. R. V. Pierce, as follows:

"At times I was hardly able to be on my feet. I believe I had every pain and ache a woman could have. Had a very bad case. Internal organs were very much diseased and my back was very weak. I suffered a great deal with nervous headaches, in fact, I suffered all over. This was my condition when I wrote to you for advice. After taking your 'Favorite Prescription' for about three months can say that my health was never better."

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription

Is a positive cure for weakness and disease of the feminine organism. It allays inflammation, heals ulceration and soothes pain. Tones and builds up the nerves. Do not permit a dishonest dealer to substitute for this medicine which has a record of 40 years of cures. "No, thank you, I want what I ask for."

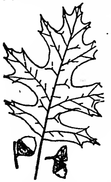
THE OAK FAMILY IN FORESTRY

BY

Warren H. Miller

COPYRIGHT BY FIELD AND STREAM

EXCEPT for purely commercial forestry, I am sure our people would not want our forests to be like those I saw this year during an extensive trip over the German forests, where only three out of over two hundred forests were by natural reproduction, all the rest being planted. For the lumberman these forests, located right handy to good transportation and continually producing an annual yield, would be ideal, for the trees grow so straight that everything from the three-inch thinnings up to the sixteen-inch full-grown trees are marketable at profitable rates and have their use in the economy of the national life of Germany. The trees reach sixteen-inch diameter in sixty-year revolutions, are protected from fire along the railroad right-of-way by fire borders and have but little fire risk and no patrol expenses, as something is always going on in nearly all the sections so that there are plenty of woodsmen about to head off incipient fires. When we get a sane system of state forest taxation taxing only the value of the yearly thinnings and the final forest crop, such forestry will become an established commercial enterprise with us, whereas our present system of taxing annually the entire value of the stand is most unjust and one of the biggest hindrances to the introduction of commercial forestry in place of our present speculative lumbering.

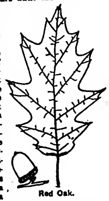


Scarlet Oak.

The Prussians have worked out commercial forestry to a mathematical science. They know to a dot just how long a given forest of kiefer, or sylvester pine, will take to reach maturity, just how much thinning is best and when to do it, just the right age and soil for the plantations, every known disease of the tree and its remedy, and just where to market every splinter of it at maximum profit. And their government encourages them with compulsory fire protection from the railroads and just tax laws. The same system prevails with the spruce and fir of Saxony and the hardwoods of Hesse and Westphalia, so that they make from $6.50 an acre per year in the spruce of Wurtemburg to $2.50 in the sylvester pine forests of Prussia, and the annual yield from but thirty-five million acres of forest is four and one-half billion board feet! But we are far from any such exact knowledge of our tree species as this, and we have over a hundred species where they use but seven. And it is a well-known fact that many of our experiments in clear cutting and planting have so far failed. After ten or twelve successive generations of foresters have studied out our best species for pure stand raising and we have, as it were, grown up with our forests and know them as do the older nations, this system will be applicable on a large scale with us. It is being applied now to a certain extent with white pine, as witness the numerous successful, though young, stands of white pine in New England. The total area of planted forest with us is now about 1,100,000 acres. The total land that would yield best on planted forests is more than 56,000,000 acres.

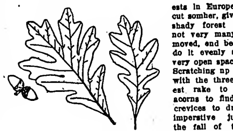
The French system of futaie regulaire, or standard forest, is the more likely one for us to use, or rather to grow into, for we are in for at least fifty years of selective forests before any extensive use of standard forest can be introduced. In the French system three cuts are necessary when the forest reaches maturity: The seeding cut is first made, letting in sun on the forest floor, and varying in amount widely, depending upon the species of the tree. The next fall of seeds from the seeding trees results in a dense floor of young shoots, for the sun's warmth is present to germinate and to feed the young trees with sunlight. Then follows the secondary cut, when the trees have reached the age of five years and are tough enough to allow cutting operations without too many of them being killed. This cut takes nearly all the old trees, leaving enough to protect the young thicket from wind, frost and drought. The terminal cut follows when the young trees reach about ten years of age, and takes the last of the old stand. First thinning begins five years later and continues every ten years until the main stand reaches maturity. The thinning cuts are worth about one-third the value of the final crop.

This little outline will give an idea of how much knowledge and judgment is demanded of the forester. Unless he knows exactly what he is doing, the method is dangerous and apt to result in failure of the reproduction, requiring excessive planting. In France successive generations of foresters have worked it out to a science for the eight species of trees that are used in their forestry operations. We will accumulate this experience for our own species in time.



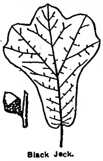
Red Oak.

But the kind of forestry which we can begin to practice right now, both in woodlots and in small private tracts, is a combination of the French system with ordinary selective forestry, that is, taking out ripe trees here and there as they mature. If you have a fair sprinkling of good oaks on your woodlot, there is no reason why you should not encourage them a little by giving them a chance to extend. If you have a tract of barren land hardly worth pasturage and for which the tax man has no terrors for you, there is no reason why you should not set it out in white pine, or sylvester pine, or whatever species your state forester specifies as suitable for the soil and climate. Keep cattle and running fires out of the woodlot, plant out your spare acorns every chance you get, use up the weed trees for cordwood, and take out worthless trees wherever they are crowding the young oaks, and you will soon be in a fair way to own a valuable oak stand. The same is true of small forest tracts of a few hundred acres, the ideal sportsman's retreat. You can practice an immense amount of culture forestry during your hunts and camps and wanderings about your tract. Here and there will be predominating areas of valuable species which only need a little encouragement to take up the whole land. You are always using firewood out of the tract. Make that firewood pay by planting the room each tree leaves with a half-dozen oak or pine seeds, or, better, keep a little nursery of white pines and white oaks and draw from it as you take out worthless stuff. A white pine twelve years old is a very respectable little specimen twenty feet high and three inches across the butt. In six years it is higher than your head, and wants at least twenty square feet of room, so, before you know it, what was once a clump of soft maples and white birches is now a thicket of thrifty young pines. As regards the oaks, a sharp stick and your heel is all they need to put the acorn down two inches into the mulch. There ought to be one seedling every ten paces, with a reasonable chance at the sun, all over that part of your forest where oaks are wont to grow.



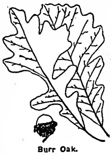
White Oak.

As the oaks are the most important family of the hardwoods, and one in which every sportsman is interested, I will just run over in review the most widely distributed members of the family in our country. We are blessed with many species, suitable to all kinds of soils and climates. At the head of the family stands the white oak, quercus alba, the noblest tree in our forests. You will know him by the familiar deeply notched leaf with nine regular lobes disposed four on a side with one at the end. Along in October it turns a fine copper color and then brown, hanging on all winter, so that, when snow is on the ground, if you see a patch of brown foliage amid the bare tree trunks, it's either a white oak or a beech. Look under the tree in early October or late September and find the long oval acorn, brown and light yellow. They grow usually in pairs with a rough knobby cup, not scaled, bowl shaped. The bark is light gray, somewhat rough, and young trees have many little tufts of twigs up and down the trunk, which will develop into side branches if the least sun gets down to them. The wood is strong and fine—no comparison with such a brashy specimen as the red oak. Just try the two with a plane and saw, and report on the difference in working. None but sharp-edged tools need apply with white oak. In forestry the white oak, that is, its equivalent quercus robur is grown, pure, in big forests in Europe. Seeding cut somber, giving a quite shady forest floor with not very many trees removed, and be careful to do it evenly so that no very open spaces are left. Scratching up the humus with the three tined forest rake to allow the acorns to find plenty of crevices to drop into is imperative just before the fall of the acorns. Seeding should be completed in one fall of seeds. When sure that the reproduction has been acquired, proceed with the secondary cut, taking but one tree in two to three, more or less, depending upon whether spring frosts are to be feared. A secondary cut may be necessary in the judgment of the forester, two years later, before proceeding with the final cut. Clearance of the seedlings is almost always necessary, as the young oak is slow and apt to be beaten out by young beeches and maples during the first few years of its infancy. Thinning: Up to the age of low thickets the stand can be left very dense, but from that time on proceed drastically in favor of the dominant trees, intervening when you see culture necessary to aid them, and in general leaving enough of the dominated and suppressed trees to protect the trunks of your dominants—the trees of the future. Return in ten years, or earlier if conditions are favorable, and take out all dead and dominated trees, and all of the dominants that are getting crooked or being left behind, the rule being to keep the tops of your best trees always with a little space to meet in, which space is filled with second stage dominated trees. Leave in the beech sub-growth and any other tolerant trees which add leaf-fall to the humus. The trees will reach eight inches diameter in thirty years and you will thin about one hundred per acre every trip. From that time on they add a great deal more to their volume every year, since they grow a new ring all around the trunk, which by this time is over two feet in circumference. Of course, as you will start with a forest with some grown trees on it, you will arrange it so as to always have some mature cutting to do, as well as thinning cuts on all other sections. The management of a forest is always a paying proposition, so long as you choose to keep at it, and while you will never see the final crops cut of the sections that you regenerated, you have had a good deal of business out of the old forest and the thinning cuts of the new, and your forest or woodlot has increased in value, not deteriorated, under your hands.



Black Jack.

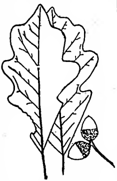
Closely allied to the white oak, and sold with it, is the Swamp White Oak, quercus bicolor, good for your wet soils and creek bottoms. Know it by the heavy-ended, slightly lobed leaf, and the rather small bottle-shaped acorns, in pairs on a stem anywhere from an inch to three inches long. The leaf is something like that of the black jack, but the acorn, the bark and the size of the tree will prevent confusing it. A third tree in the white oak class is the Burr Oak, but with harder and tougher wood. It is also called the over-cup oak, technical name quercus macrocarpa. Leaf has a big lobed head with two very deep notches about half-way down. Bark of twigs always has corky wings, and the acorn is very large with scaly, fringed cup. This tree grows across the whole United States to Montana, as far south as the latitude of New York City, parallel 40 degrees. All these white oaks will grow sylviculturally under the same treatment, and all seed annually. The flowers are miserable little catkins of green, pin-headed flowerets, in clusters of four or five catkins on a sheaf.



Burr Oak.

No forest would be complete without a few specimens of the chestnut-oak family. If you pick up a leaf with scalloped edges and find a big acorn with long oval nut, over an inch long, with fine, scaly cup, that's q. prinus, the Chestnut oak. It has very strong, hard wood, durable in soil and water, used for fencing and railroad ties. Bark is fine for tanning operations and it grows well as simple or standard coppice, as described in my previous series on European Forestry. Another form of chestnut oak is known as Yellow oak, with a leaf startlingly like the chestnut itself, but the acorn gives it away. The illustration shows a representative leaf. Both the chestnut oak are annual seeders and their value in forestry is best in the shape of tan-bark coppice.

A widely distributed and interesting oak, but of no value in forestry is the Black Jack. You will know it at sight by the blunt-ended leaf with three lobes, rough black bark (smooth higher up the tree) and small stemless acorn with scaly cup. As a woodsman, put it down in your memory against the time you want a very hard wood. Otherwise leave it severely alone, except to clean it out as a forest weed.



Swamp White Oak.

It belongs to the bristle-tipped and pointed-leaved families of oaks, of which the red oak is the representative and most valuable species. Seeding is biennial. Sylvicultural treatment of red oak about the same as white oak, except that the seeding cut must be a trifle more open. The red oak is claimed to be a faster grower than the white and it certainly overtops it and crowds it out in direct competition. I am of the opinion, however, that if the white oak is given an equal amount of sunlight it will give a crop of mature trees within ten years of the corresponding plantation of red oak. From the carpenter's point of view there is no comparison between it and the white oak, nor is there when it comes to market value as the white commands nearly double the figure. Personally I find red oak much easier to work, rather brashy, and nowhere near so strong as the white. It is a hardy, aggressive grower in the forest, and you will know it by its large, dark-green, shiny, pointed, lobed leaves and its big blunt acorn with the flat saucerlike cup. This acorn is the distinguishing feature, as the black oak has a very similar leaf but its acorn is half enclosed in a green, scaly cup. The red oak has the smoothest bark of any of them, nearly black, greenish tinged on the north side. Leaves turn a deep red, late in October. Now that white oak is getting so high priced the red is used a great deal in interior house trim. It will grow on dry soils, which fact often decides its choice as the forest species when choosing between it and white oak.

Its cousin the black oak, and the scarlet oak, q. cocinea, are so like it in leaf that all that can be said is that the leaf is more deeply notched and heavier-veined. You must look to the acorn to be sure. Both scarlet and black have a deep-cupped, scaly acorn, and the inner bark of the black oak is orange-yellow, making a fine dye, used in medicine as quercitron and in the industries for tanning. Wood sells as "red oak." The scarlet oak is a much smaller tree, growing best in plenty of sunlight; inner bark reddish, kernel of the acorn is white while that of the black oak is yellow. Both of them have gorgeous orange and scarlet foliage in October, and are useful for ornamental trees.

All through our moist ravines and creek bottoms you will find a tall slender oak, growing in natural pure stands, with a notched, peaky leaf like the red and black oaks. But under the tree you are sure to find abundant small round acorns with shallow cups, almost smooth. The little acorns are half an inch long and very pretty, sometimes with delicate light stripes running longitudinally. This tree is the Pink Oak or water oak, q. palustris. Wood is coarse and not durable; sells as "second" red oak. Pin oak, beech and black gum are, however, the three toughest woods in the forest. Sylviculturally the tree has no value; when you take one out replace it with a swamp white oak. The name pin oak comes from its value for tree nails for house building.

Two more oaks that have their own peculiarities are the Willow Oak, q. phellos, with tiny scale-cupped acorns and long willow-like leaves, and the Shingle Oak, with perfectly smooth magnolia-like leaves, smooth bark and small shallow-cupped acorns. Both of these woods split easily, and the willow oak is tough and pliable enough when none better can be had for the purpose. In conclusion, I would mention the Post Oak of the Southwest, the "white" oak of that section, deeply lobed (seven); strong wood; small, sweet acorn, scale-cupped.

KING GEORGE'S MAIL BAG

All letters addressed to the king and queen of England are sent direct to whichever of the royal residences they are occupying from the general postoffice in London in specially sealed bags, says the Strand. In the case of Buckingham palace, this bag arrives, as a rule, just as his majesty is finishing dinner, and is taken charge of by the secretary on duty, who opens it and proceeds to sort out the contents. Such letters as will ultimately demand the personal attention of King George are placed before him the same night, but it is not often that he deals with them at the moment, save in matters that will not brook delay. He glances through them, makes a few brief notes upon them, and they are then placed under lock and key until he is ready for them on the following morning.

He has barely had time to deal with these before the royal breakfast is served and almost simultaneously an even larger bag of correspondence arrives. Only those who have been called upon to handle them can realize the vastness of the royal postbags, the contents of which often range from a private communication from some amiable lunatic who considers that his claim to the British throne is superior to that of King George. By the organization of a well nigh perfect system, however, this heavy correspondence is dealt with in remarkably quick time. Lord Stamfordham, should he be on duty, opens every communication, and, glancing at it, places the bulk of it in the large crimson leather basket labeled with the tenor of the epistle.

Thus invitations to undertake public functions of one description or another go into one basket, charitable appeals into another, the official report of the proceedings of the two houses of parliament into a smaller basket, letters of a personal character into a fourth, and so on. At the finish there is a small but highly important little pile left. This is composed of letters from the rulers of other states, personal reports from our ambassadors abroad or communications from ministers at home. These never for one instant leave the custody of whoever is intrusted with the task of opening them. There is a special box standing on the table with a slit in the top of it wide enough to take any paper. It is fastened with a patent lock, of which only the king, Lord Knollys and Lord Stamfordham have the keys.

These are the first letters that are presented to the king every morning, together with a memorandum reminding him of the duties he has to perform that day. In many cases the king elects to write letters in reply with his own hand, but should this not be convenient he sends for one of his secretaries and dictates his reply. His majesty is by no means a quick thinker and likes to ponder over every word that he proposes to place on paper. In this respect he presents a curious contrast to his late father, who would reply to the most important letter in a few seconds.

THEATER IN CHINA

Playhouse Is the Great National Amusement.

English Writer Attends Performance and Tells of His Experience With Celestials—Play Lasts Several Days.

Pekin, China.—The theater in China is the great national amusement, and the Chinese will attend a play that lasts for several days without getting the least tired of it, says an English writer.

Figure to yourself a huge, dingy barn crammed full of Chinese, mostly of the coolie class, the men all on one side and the women on the other; attendants go round selling saucers of fruit, melon seeds, sweetmeats and cups of green, unstewed tea. Up above is a huge gallery, also crammed with tier upon tier of men, women and children, smoking, eating and gesticulating, but, as a rule, perfectly well behaved. In the last respect they could give many of our own music hall audiences points, and they never applaud.

Some have taken their shoes off and sit with their bare feet up on the edge in front of them, where also is placed the program (in Chinese and written from the bottom of the page up to the top), and the saucers of fruit and other "chow" purchased from the half-naked attendants. The odor from this unwashed mass of humanity is appalling.

As you push your way through the crowd to your reserved pew, because that is exactly what it is like, you hear the beating of tomtoms and the strident squeak of fiddles completely out of tune, mingled with a sound as though all the fireirons in Christendom were being thrown downstairs. This is the orchestra, and it plays throughout the performance; there is no escape from it, even for a moment, and the crash of cymbals and bangings of gongs never give you one moment's respite.

Through the dim, cloudy atmosphere you catch sight of what is happening on the stage. There is no scenery, no drop curtain, no wings and no footlights. The actors make their entrance from doors at the back of the stage, one of which is to the left and the other on the right.

No actresses appear. Although not actually forbidden, it is considered extremely bad form for a woman to appear on the stage in China. All the women's parts have to be taken by men, and the impersonation is absolutely perfect as to deportment, gesture, dress and figure, and, above all, voice. The shrill falsetto twittering is perfectly produced, and the little half shuffle, half run, the expression, etc., are all faithfully portrayed.

A Theater in China.

I was lucky in seeing two distinct plays with a fresh set of actors in each. Some of the dresses are really gorgeous, and the make-up is particularly good. In the first play we were shown a reproduction of a real Chinese criminal court, in which, at any trial, in true Oriental fashion, they torture and punish the prisoner long before they decide whether or not he is guilty, and in the second play two mighty warriors, twins and rivals for the same maiden's hand, fought a long and most realistic duel, first with daggers, then with long swords, and eventually they indulged in a spirited wrestling match, quite acrobatic in its movements, until one poor fellow whirled madly in the air, turned a trick somersault and expired doing a cartwheel. It was really funny, but the audience took it all quite seriously. Many of the women broke down and wept at the woes the heroine had to go through, while to the European eye the whole thing was simply ludicrous.

Big Price for Arm.

Pendleton, Ore.—Attorney Dan P. Smythe, president of the Commercial association and secretary of the Oregon Wool Growers' association, is in Portland to prosecute a damage suit against the Northern Pacific company for $60,000. While accompanying a train load of sheep to Tacoma eighteen months ago he received injuries which resulted in the loss of an arm and caused him to spend several months in the hospital.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Was Bitten by Bloodthirsty Barbastel

NEW YORK.—A large, ferocious, bloodthirsty barbastel, which chiropterous mammal is probably more familiar to you under its Latin nickname of Synotus Barbastellus, caused a panic among the one hundred employes of Benjamin Fechter, a clothing manufacturer, when it flew through a window of the loft the other morning at 10 o'clock, and bit, scratched, clawed and tore the hair, eyes, ears and noses of several of the men and women working at the machines.

The barbastel is generally insectivorous or frugivorous, and is a first cousin of the big-eared Megn-der-ma-gi-gis, which inhabits Australia. The barbastel in question, however, was decidedly carnivorous, and to judge from the way it tried to make a ten-course dinner from the physiognomy of Morris Binberg, one of the cutters, it had not eaten for several days.

Binberg was the first one to see the barbastel as it flew into the shop. Binberg has nice fat cheeks and the barbastel made straight for the cutter, who dived under his machine too late. The terrible animal caught him by the hair and Binberg started to do a Marathon around the room, shrieking for help at the top of his lungs, while women fainted, and of course, it follows that strong men grew pale.

The other employes ran out of the room in a panic, but as they couldn't pronounce the name of the bloodthirsty animal they did not succeed in getting help.

Finally Mr. Barbastel was cornered and clapped under an empty box, and some 5 or 18 people sat on top to make sure that it didn't escape.

Mr. Fechter returned from a business call, and found his employes completely metrogrobolized by the awful encounter. Cautiously lifting up the box, he looked within and began to laugh as though he would burst a blood vessel. His employes were aghast when Mr. Fechter grabbed the animal and shoved it into a wide-necked bottle.

"What is it, a-neagis?"

"No, you blockheads; it's only a bat," said Mr. Fechter.

"Oy oy," said the employes, and went back to work.

Finds Young Son After a Long Search

DENVER.—"There's my pops," said four-year-old Frederick Eugene Lockwood, pressing his face against the window-pane of one of the rooms of the state home for dependent children. A minute later the boy had his arms around his father's neck and both father and son were crying with joy. His identification by the boy was a test suggested by the father to prove that he was the boy's parent.

Frederick H. Lockwood, the father, is a balloonist and parachute jumper.

When he asked for the custody of the child he suggested a test to prove that he was the boy's father. He stood, with several other men, outside the home and the boy was taken to a window and asked if he recognized any of the party. The child picked out his father without hesitation.

Little Frederick Lockwood was taken to the detention home last October and left there by Mrs. Edith M. Villsume Goehsl, who told the matron of the home that the boy was turned over to her by an inmate of a resort in Seattle, Wash. She asked the detention home to take charge of the boy.

When the child was undressed at the detention home it was found that his left arm was broken, his left collar bone dislocated and that his body was covered with marks and bruises. He was sent to the county hospital, and from there to the state home. He has never recovered from his injuries, and may be a cripple all his life.

Ants' Nests Divert Fashionable City

PARIS.—With the approach of spring the rage for novelty has descended on fashionable Paris. On all sides new forms of the entertainment of guests and new ways of doing things are being subjected to experiment.

One of the most curious of the new fashions is the ants' nest craze. No hostess thinks a drawing room complete unless it contains a glass case inside of which are a few pounds of earth, a large number of ants and their eggs, and a supply of more or less suitable food. Guests are provided with magnifying glasses and are invited to watch the industrious insects carrying on their domestic and civic duties, much as if still in a country field.

To vary the program the ants are made to engage in a pitched battle as one swarm is introduced into the nest of another. Invaders and invaded lock in fierce combat, and a hastily improvised hospital and ambulance service for the injured is organized by the non-combatants. This idea was introduced into Paris society by a well-known singer.

Another innovation which is having an immense success is a dog's training college, which was opened in the most fashionable quarter of Paris. Here a society woman's dumb friend is lodged, fed, and educated in all that he should and should not do at the trifling fee of about $30 a month, though day pupils are admitted at a lower rate.

Many graceful accomplishments are imparted in the course, which is divided into school and college grades, and diplomas are awarded on a certain standard of proficiency being attained. It is jokingly said that the time-honored French polish is going to the dogs.

Old Mansion May Be Sold for Taxes

CHICAGO.—Remnants of what once was the Reber mansion, Chicago's pride in ante-bellum days, will be sold for taxes by Cook county some time in March. For forty years county, state and city have attempted unsuccessfully the collection of taxes on this last vestige of the Reber estate.

And the proceeding will not be without its pathos and romance. By it the home will be sold over the head of Gertrude V. Raber Backus, who in her eighth decade of life is alone in the world. In her eighty years she has seen the mansion of old transformed into a forfeited hovel.

The property is at Ellis avenue and East Fortieth street, in the heart of a choice residence district. Lots of 50-foot frontage there are valued at $10,000. Tax complications have destroyed title to the Reber property and Mrs. Backus has been clinging to her home in the face of impending dispossession.

For thirty years tax buyers have grasped the Reber property at each delinquent tax sale. In those years the residence, with its site, was accepted as a good risk by tax buyers. As years went by and the aged owner clung persistently to her abode, even in defiance of law, the tax buyers abandoned it as a bad proposition.

Since 1901 the county has levied on the property regularly. Delinquency notices were served with no effect. Court procedure had as little effect. The gray-haired defendant let everything go by default and held steadfastly to her abode.

Repentance.

The man who repeats before he is found out is generally pretty sure that somebody has picked up the right clew.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

BEST LOVED MAN IN AUSTRIA

Undoubtedly the best-loved man in broad Austria is not cross old Kaiser Franz Josef, but his still older cousin and councillor, Archduke Rainer. Rainer is very, very old; and he is known as "the Rainer." When clerks and lawyers on their way to the Innenstadt pass his little place in Favoritinstrasse, and see pressed to the window a white face, white hair, a short white beard and long white mustache, they do not say, "That is the Archduke." They say, "Look at the Rainer," and they repeat some ancient tale from the Neue Freie Presse about the Rainer's immemorial antiquity.

The Rainer is indeed terribly old. He was born and grew up in the days when Austria owned Venetia, and there his papa, another Archduke Rainer, ruled; and this papa was born away back in 1783, almost in the rococo age of Watteau shepherdesses, Rosenkavaliers and George Washington. But as if to mock at his antiquity, the Rainer is the most modern man among the hundred and fifty Hapsburg archdukes. In all that relates to soldiering, politics, art and science no man outdistances the Rainer. He made Vienna an art and science city.

EUROPE'S ROYAL HOUSEWIFE

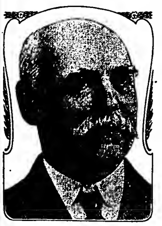
It would be hard to find a more capable housekeeper than the empress of Germany.

Her ideal is service: she has devoted her life to serving her country, her husband, and her children. She believes that this is woman's highest and only mission, and that women are happy as long as they keep to this ideal. The empress has never interfered in affairs of state, and the dazzle of court life has meant little to her. But she has always found joy caring for the comforts of the emperor, looking after her children, and managing her household.

When the Kaiser calls for his wife he finds her engrossed in the many departments of her housekeeping lore in which she is so proficient. Though she does not go into the kitchen and order her groceries and meats as do her subjects, the chief steward comes to her study every morning and they plan the menus for luncheon and dinner together. She often suggests new dishes and makes changes in the menus as they are presented. For she keeps many cook books in her study and is always on the lookout for new recipes.

The empress does not believe in foolish extravagance in dressing any more than in conducting her palace. Though her tailored suits and her dinner gowns are made outside, she keeps a dressmaker busy all the year round remodeling her gowns and those for her daughter.

MAKING PRESS ARRANGEMENTS



Letters are being received daily by Charles S. Albert, chairman of the standing committee of correspondents in charge of the Press Galleries of the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, asking for reservations in the press sections at the Republican and Democratic National conventions, the latter of which will be held in Baltimore June 25. The committee of which Mr. Albert is the chairman has been designated by the national committees of the two parties to receive all requests and assist in the assignment of seats in the press sections of the two conventions.

Mr. Albert has been in the Washington newspaper field for 21 years, now approximating the deanship of the corps in point of service. He was manager of the Press News Association, night editor of the United Press and in charge of the New York World Bureau before, during and after the Spanish-American war, and has since remained with that paper's local staff. He has been with the World 16 years, and now constitutes one of the wheel horses in the famous Pulitzer organization.

A native of Indiana, having been born in Union county, Mr. Albert is 53 years old.

LEADER IN INDIAN AFFAIRS

The new maharajah, Ripu Singh, is the son of the deceased rajah, Sir Heira Singh Malvinda Bahadar, G. C. S. I., G. C. I. E., of Nabha, whose death was announced December 27, 1911. The state of Nabha is one of the three Phulkian states of the Punjab, but as the Maharajah of Nabha is the direct descendant of Bahe Phul, the great common ancestor of the Phulkian chiefs, therefore the rajahs of Nabha are regarded with special reverence by the two other chiefs of Patiala and Jhind, and have great influence among the sikh community. Moreover, the original place of their forefathers, a village named Phul, after the name of their common ancestor, is in the territory of Nabha state. Nabha state is about 1,000 square miles in extent with a population of 800,000 and annual revenue of about twenty lakhs of rupees. This state is in alliance with the British throne, and under the treaty the Rajah of Nabha has the right to inflict capital punishment in his territory.

His Highness the Maharajah Ripu Daman Singh is only twenty-eight years of age but has already distinguished himself in the council chamber,

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Speaker's Wife a Strenuous Teacher

WASHINGTON.—C. A. Tooreysoa, who calls Ladonia his home and travels for a St. Louis wholesale grocery-house, was talking of schoolday experiences. Charlie was one of "Peck's bad boys," one of the unterrified village cut-ups, when he went to school, in the '70s. He admits that he and most of his companions were pretty hard to handle.

"I went to school in Martinsburg in 1878," he said. "Miss Bennett of Callaway county, now the wife of Speaker Clark, was my teacher, and, believe me, she knew her business. She was the assistant teacher in the school.

"There were four boys in Miss Bennett's class who were looked upon as really tough. As they used to say in those days, they were hard nuts to crack, but there wasn't one of us that ever frightened Miss Bennett. Charlie Clark, Tom Roach, Will Powell and myself constituted this quartet of bad ones, and what meanness one couldn't think of the other could.

"In spelling we always occupied positions at the foot of the class, but I remember that on one occasion we spelled every word that came to us, and when the lesson was over we stood one, two, three, four, right at the head.

"Then came the expose. Bill Ficklin told Miss Bennett we had stealthily looked at the book each time we had to spell a word, and that was why we made such a high average.

"The fun began when school was dismissed. We sat on Ficklin and gave him a good licking. The next day we were brought before the court, with Miss Bennett as the presiding judge. I told her that we licked Ficklin because he tattled on us, and to give me the whipping and let the other boys go.

"The other boys, with the exception of Bill Powell, put up a good talk. Powell refused to say a word. This obstinacy aroused the simon-pure fighting spirit in Miss Bennett, who turned the rest of us loose and started on Bill. She gave him one of the best 'whalings' he had ever had in his life.

How Senator Williams Fought a Duel

COMPARATIVELY few seem to know that old John Sharp Williams once fought a duel.

It was when John Sharp was over in Germany attending Heidelberg university. He and a German student sassed each other, and the German challenged him to co-operate with him in determining which one should die a premature death. John Sharp Williams, being the challenged party, had the choice of weapons. His opponent, forgetting all about his being an American, supposed he would pick sabers, just as any German would; but there was where John Sharp came along with a neat little joke. He said they would fight with United States army revolvers.

The idea of shooting at a man with a Colt's revolver two feet long was new to German dueling, and the native student was a wreck when the morning arrived for them to kill off one another. John Sharp, on the other hand, ate heartily of ham and eggs, as the saying is, and seemed perfectly composed when they toed themselves up for the opening shot. The German, with vibrant hand, fired off south by southeast of John Sharp, who purposely shot up toward a spot about eight degrees to the left of the zenith.

And having thus speedily completed the morning's entertainment, the principals shook hands and went their respective way apparently undisturbed.

Senator John Sharp Williams is also a keen student of practical jokes.

They were having a house party at the Williams' home here, recently, and some of the young people asked the senator to co-operate with them in playing a merry trick on his son. The plan was to squirt a quantity of ice water over the transom on young Williams after he had retired for the night.

About one o'clock that night a wild snort of dismay from Senator Williams echoed and re-echoed through the house.

He had absent-mindedly gone to sleep in his son's bed.

Big Senator's "Special for Three"

IF the proprietor of one of those "Seeing Washington" outfits could take tourists to see Ollie James eat dinner he would make a great hit.

James, who is representative and senator-elect from Kentucky, is the largest man in public life, and to see him dredge into a beefsteak is an inspiration. The other day James dropped into a Pennsylvania avenue restaurant and ordered a bite to eat, which he had a perfect right to do. He ordered without ostentation, pomp or pretense, and had no thought of attracting attention to his gastronomic prowess. But little groups of diners began to collect near James' table to see what would happen.

"Bring me a steak," James told the waiter, and that was all the plans or specifications for the steak that he furnished. The waiter seemed to understand. Presently he returned with an amplitudinous leviathan of a steak that appeared on the scorecard as "special for three."

That's the kind of a steak that Ollie James can masticate with much glee, provided there are enough side dishes to whet his appetite.

Do not get the impression, either, that the colossal statesman from Kentucky is a glutton. The kind of a steak he eats is no more adequate food supply for him than a couple of lamb chops would be for the average five-foot-ten work-a-day citizens.

Society Will Dress for the Cardinal

CARDINAL GIBBONS' annual spring visit to Washington is causing no end of trouble in the social world. The edict recently issued by Pope Pius that cardinals and high churchmen should not attend dinner parties where low cut gowns are worn, which edict was taken up and circulated by Cardinal Farley and Cardinal Bourne, of London, is, it is said, causing women in society to seek their dressmakers in haste.

Cardinal Gibbons is a great favorite in Washington, and is annually entertained here by Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. William F. Draper, Miss Patten, the Chief Justice and Mrs. Edward D. White, Mrs. Henry C. Corbin and others. His first visit was with Mrs. William F. Draper, who gave a dinner in his honor. Mrs. Corbin, Miss Patten, Mrs. Elkins and others will entertain the cardinal, but none of them, so far as is known, has followed Cardinal Bourne's example, when he issued invitations to a large reception and asked the women invited to wear bodices with high collars. It is probable that Mrs. Draper, who is one of the stanchest admirers of the cardinal, will intimate to her women guests that it will be in good taste to wear afternoon gowns, whether they are Catholics or Protestants.

It has long been the custom of women when attending a dinner or reception in honor of Cardinal Gibbons to wear their most costly gowns and jewels, and it will require some change in the fashion of dinner gowns to conform to the new rule. There are so many prominent Catholic women here, however, that there is no fear but that every care will be taken not to offend the churchmen.

ENGLISH SPEECH FOR CHINA.

As nobody knows even approximately the number of inhabitants in the vast Chinese domain, so, perhaps, nobody can say definitely and positively how many distinct dialects are spoken by the peoples of the different provinces. A recent authority puts the number at "over a hundred." So widely differing in many respects are many of these dialects that they constitute practically distinct languages. To endeavor to group, combine and standarize these languages into one common speech for the whole empire would be a work of many years and of immense difficulties. In fact, it would seem to be an undertaking involving greater difficulties than the introduction of a complete new tongue. And it must be remembered that the official and educated classes are familiar already with English. The language is taught in the universities and many of the schools. It is the common medium of official communication with other governments. At the same time, the leaders of the new movement are enthusiastic friends of our country. If the republican movement shall succeed, that success may be followed by the transformation of the Chinese into an English-speaking people.

It was noted in these columns recently that the price of platinum in the New York market had risen to the highest figure ever reached—over seven hundred dollars a pound. All over the world the demand for platinum arising from the use of the metal in electrical appliances has made it highly prized. In connection with this subject a curious story comes from Paris. It is said that a number of twenty-franc gold pieces forged in the reign of Napoleon III., have been found to be worth at least double their face value. This is due to the fact that in the alloy of which these forged coins were made platinum was used. At that time platinum was cheap. A pound weight of it could be bought for a few sovereigns. The spurious twenty-franc pieces contain about six grammes of platinum each, and today these six grammes are worth about $9.
